The floating mine consisted of an iron hull propeller of 295 tons, the Louisiana, with a light upper deck specially prepared for the work. The powder, amounting to 430,000 pounds, was placed in barrels and canvas bags, through each of which passed a fuse arranged in four separate threads and terminating at the stern in a pile of combustibles. The combustibles were to be fired by a percussion cap set off by clockwork, by spermaceti candles and a slow match.

The naval preparations were on the grandest scale, and it was intended to open on the fort with hundreds of cannon in case the explosion did not accomplish the destruction, so that the land columns could advance with prospect of success. The largest fleet that had ever sailed under the American flag assembled off the coast, led by the New Ironsides, a powerful ironclad, with sixteen guns in broadside. There were four other ironclads, the Canonicus, the Mahopac, the Monadnock and the Saugus, and the screw frigates Minnesota, Colorado and Wabash. The remainder, to the number of fifty, consisted of gunboats, side wheelers, double enders and other steamers converted into warships. The total amount was 619 guns. The land column consisted of several thousand men, commanded by General Godfrey Weitzel. They were brought up in transports and were to effect a landing under cover of the guns of the ships.

The garrison of Fort Fisher at this time numbered 1,500 men, 450 of them being junior reserves or local troops.

Much was expected of the navy, because it was found that there was seven feet of water on the beach. After several attempts to have the transports with the troops and the war vessels rendezvous at some point off the fort, the navy alone weathered the gales that blew for several days and reached the position on the night of the 23d of December. About midnight the powder boat was placed at anchor 300 yards from the beach opposite the fort and the match was applied. At 1:40 the explosions occurred, four in number. At daylight the vessels stood in for the scene. The fort was still there, grim and defiant, its flag floating proudly and no evidence of injury visible. The transports with troops were not up, and Porter ordered the bombardment to begin. The New Ironsides led, taking position in gallant style under fire from several guns of the fort. The entire fleet drew up in lines as detailed, and the fire was directed with great deliberation upon particular guns in the huge work. The fort answered and fired 672 shots at the fleet. The commander ordered the firing to cease, because his supply of ammunition was limited. The navy, believing the enemy had been silenced, withdrew.

During the night of the 24th the transports brought up the troops, and arrangements were made to continue the bombardment on the 25th and follow it up by a land assault. A column under General Adelbert Ames was formed on the seacoast and advanced to within half a mile of the fort, capturing an outwork and some men. General Weitzel went to the front in person and saw that the fort had not been seriously injured and reported it impregnable. The navy kept up a steady fire, and it was observed that the garrison left the parapets where the shots struck, but were out in full force at other points. Wherever the fire took effect the sand walls were scooped out, leaving great gaps, so that there was no longer a continuous line of shelter for troops.

The bombardment on the 25th lasted seven hours, and the fire was returned at intervals by the guns of the fort. The Confederates fired 600 shots at the fleet and used some grape and canister on the troops. Five guns on the works were disabled by the naval fire on the 25th. Three had been disabled on the 24th and one had burst, leaving thirty-four yet in position. The fort gave the parting shots as the vessels were retiring. In the two days' bombardment the Confederates lost six killed and fifty-five wounded.

General Butler had learned from the prisoners taken that there was a large land force of Confederates, the division of General Hoke from Petersburg, on the peninsula in rear of his land column. On the night of the 25th he notified Admiral Porter that he would sail with his transport fleet to Hampton Roads. Butler's decision was final, although the admiral stated that he was about to receive fresh ammunition and would fire much faster than he had done and hoped that General Butler would leave a force on land to press the assault.

Admiral Porter complained in his dispatches to the navy department that he had been abandoned by the army just as the fort was in his possession and asked that the troops be sent back, but under a different commander.

The Confederate commander in Fort Fisher, however, holds the opinion that Butler could not have succeeded. He says he would "have opened a fire of grape and canister on the narrow beach which no troops could have survived."

The Man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

SOME REASONS WHY PEOPLE ARE SETTLING IN MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA.

Because it is the best country known to the man of moderate means.
Because you will find a country of rich soil awaiting the settler.
Because there are uplands, prarieland, and alluvial river bottoms.
Because you can be certain of profitable returns from whatever you put into the soil.
Because the winter does not consume what the summer produces.
Because there are more and better opportunities for deversified farming than elsewhere.
Because the seasons are regular and no fear of crop failure.
Because the country is never scourged by cyclones and devastating storms and blizzards.
Because everything grown elsewhere can be produced here more abundantly.
Because truck farming is a success; products being early on the market obtain high prices.
Because no better fruit country is known, oranges, plums, peaches, pears, apples, grapes, strawberries, figs, pecans and other fully maturing.
Because there are more chances for profitable investment of capital than elsewhere in this country.
Because for healthfulness this section is unequalled on the face of the globe.
Because you have no long winter months to encounter, with no excessive dry heat in summer.
Because the climate is more uniform than elsewhere, no extremes of heat or cold.
Because you will find the as orderly communities as anywhere on this continent.
Because you will find the most open-hearted people on the globe.
Because education is paramount; public schools and churches of every denomiuation are to be found in all communities.
Because the railroad facilities of this section are unexcelled, a double tracked railroad traversing the entire length of both states.
Because really good lands are yet cheap.
Because the geographical location of these states gives them the best markets in the United States.

We secure land for home-seekers or for colonies. Write to-day for full particulars and letters from Northern farmers already located in the South.

AT THE LAST.

Many newspapers throughout the State and adjoining Commonwealths have paid tributes to the memory of the late Governor Lowndes, who was loved and respected wherever known, but no more terse and faithful tribute has been written than that which appeared in the Cumberland Evening Times yesterday which we reproduce below:

With Lloyd Lowndes the book of life has closed, and there is nothing more to be added to or subtracted from the sum of his existence in this world. The trial balance is in the hands of his Maker.

We believe there is a balance upon the right side. We will not speak of his benevolence or make a parade of his charities. It would not please the dead. We will make no reference to the probable ambitions and plans for the future, blasted by death. It would be no gratification to the living.

We will merely speak of him as we knew him. A courtly gentleman whose heart overflowed with the milk of human kindness. A Christian whose purse was open to every deserving charity. A citizen whose devotion to home interests and surroundings was never measured by dollars and cents. A public man whose career was free from the faintest shadow of suspicion.

In domestic life he was a model for the men of the day. He worshipped at a family altar in the midst of an elegance and refinement truly typical of the ideal American home, from which there always flowed a generous and a lavish hospitality.

From the city he loved, and from the scenes in which he was for, so many years a conspicuous figure he has passed forever. In sorrow and sadness we lay a garland of immortelles upon his grave.

ATTEST THEIR ESTEEM.

The universal esteem throughout the state of Maryland entertained for the late Gov. Lloyd Lowndes is strongly emphasized by the touching editorials appearing in the Baltimore papers:

Baltimore Sun:—The announcement of the sudden death of ex-Gov. Lloyd Lowndes, which appears in The Sun today, will come as a shock to the people of this state, and will cause general and sincere regret. To a great circle of friends this untimely ending of a good and useful life will be the occasion of genuine grief. Few men in Maryland enjoyed to a greater degree the affection of his fellow-citizens. He possessed those traits of character, that warmth of heart and those personal and social qualties which attract friends. He had a grace of manner, a frankness and kindliness that made him a charming companion. He was a member of a family which has been most conspicuous in social and political affairs in Maryland from the earliest years of the colony. Several Governors of the colony and state were his ancestors. He was a man of wealth, but lived a simple and unostentatious life, and was always in the forefront of public affairs aswell as in those of his church. In business he was a man of affairs—active and sagacious.

Mr. Lowndes was, we believe, only twice elected to public office, but he always occupied a place in the public arena and always exerted a strong influence. When only 28 years of age he was elected to the House of Representatives, being the youngest member of the Forty-third Congress. In that Congress he distinguished himself by his vote on the Civil Rights bill. The Civil War had ended only seven or eight years before and the bitterness and strife of the great conflict were still at fever heat. Measures for punishment of the South were still being "jammed" through Congress, and the Civil Rights bills were urged as party measures to complete the humilation of the Southern people. Lloyd Lowndes, as young as he was, had the courage and manhood to defy the party lash and to vote against that hateful party measure. He was one of six Republicans in the House to do this, and he did it knowing that there were nearly 5,000 negro voters in his district. The Sixth Maryland district was at that time Democratic, and was represented in the Forty-second Congress by the late John Ritchie. It was the Greeley year when Mr. Lowndes was nominated, and Democrats all over the land were defeated, Mr. Ritchie among the rest, Mr. Lowndes being elected by a large majority. Two years later Mr. Lowndes was defeated by William Walsh, but the majority against him was very meager; not exceeding 50.

Mr. Lowndes did not appear again in the politics of Maryland as a candidate for public office until 22 years later, when he was nominated by the Republican party for Governor of Maryland. This nomination was a triumph of the "better element" of the Republican party, reinforced by a great number of the Independent Democrats, who revolted from their party in the memorable campaign of 1895. At that election Mr. Lowndes won by a decisive majority being the first and only Republican who has held the office of Governor of Maryland since the Civil War. While a constant member of his party, Governor Lowndes was never a narrow partisan, and in the conduct of his high office he gave abundant recognition to the Independent Democrats who aided in his election. In his personal friendships he included a large number of his strongest political opponents, who enjoyed his respect and esteem. As Governor he redeemed every pledge made during the campaign. A new assessment bill was enacted and signed, the election laws were reformed, the new Charter was granted to Baltimore city. In his administration and by his aid the Maryland Geological Survey was created, a piece of constructive legislation of greater public value, perhaps, than any such act of the Maryland General Assembly of this State in many years. In his entire conduct of affairs Governor Lowndes was liberal and broad-minded, and his administration was one of the best and most successful in the history of the State. The nomination of a Governor for re-election was almost without precedent, but Governor Lowndes received that compliment from his party. His defeat was in no way a reflection upon him personally. He was largely opposed by the baser element of his party and the negroes did not support him with enthusiasm, not having received from him the recognition they had fondly expected. Some Democrats, and Independents also, who had supported him earnestly in 1895, failed to support him in 1899. This was not because they did not have entire confidence in Mr. Lowndes, but because the organization of his party in Baltimore city was in such condition that many citizens who trusted the Governor believed that a change of party was demanded in the interest of good order in Baltimore city.

The death of Lloyd Lowndes is a distinct loss to his party in more ways than one. He was not only a wise counselor and a safe leader, but his social and business position gave a certain prestige which is of great value to any party. Socially and politically he was in close touch with the President of the United States, and that was an advantage not to be lightly considered.

While the people at large are more familiar with Governor Lowndes in his political relations, yet his business activities were of even greater importance. For a generation he was the President of a bank which under his administration became one of the strongest in the State, and he was interested in or at the head of a large number of enterprises for the upbuilding of Maryland industries.

In the death of Lloyd Lowndes Maryland has lost one of her foremost citizens, and society one of its brightest ornaments.

EX-GOVERNOR LOWNDES.

Baltimore American:—The announcement of the sudden death of Hon. Lloyd Lowndes, former governor, of Maryland, at his home, in Cumberland, yesterday, will be received with sincere regret in all parts of the state. No man in this commonwealth was held in higher esteem than he, and there is none whose death would be more generally mourned.

It was as governor that the people of Maryland knew Mr. Lowndes best. His administration from 1896 to 1900 will be recalled by future historians as a notable epoch in the political history of the state. It marked the passing of old and the coming of new political conditions. His nomination was in repose to a hearty sentiment in his own party, and his election was brought about by an urgent demand of the people fo this state, irrespective of a party, that there should be a change in its administrative and political methods. The reforms instituted by Mr. Lowndes were beneficial, and his administration, as a whole set a high standard in all that makes for the good government of a state.

Of the reforms brought about by Mr. Lowndes, none was more striking or of greater importance than the election law which was drafted by the Baltimore Reform League and which met the demands of the people of this state, a large majority of whom now regret that it was emasculated by the amendments passed during the extra session of 1901 and that for its best sections were substituted those provisions which have caused serious trouble at every election held since their enactment.

To the repeal of the obnoxious amendments and to the defeat of the disfranchising amendment to the constitution if declared valid by the Court of Appeals, Mr. Lowndes had committed himself, and to his work he promised to give his best efforts. The people of Maryland who are demanding honest election-laws regret that at a time when his services seemed most in demand Mr. Lowndes' activity should end through death. His career should be an inspiration to the living to continue the task which he had assumed.

As governor of this state Mr. Lowndes fulfilled the promises of his party. He was faithful to his trust, and, indeed, in all relations of his useful life he stood true to the highest standards In the business world the esteem in which he was held was as high as that entertained for him in the political world.

Mr. Lowndes' life and deeds were his monument and his record will live in Maryland history, illustrating the career of a man who always did his duty and who never shirked responsibility.

WOULDN'T it be wonderful thought, if these Democratic snoligosters would have half as much respect for the Constitution here in the Southern State as they pretend to have in the Philippine Islands?

JUST for the fun of the thing ask your neighbor why he is a Democrat. If he don't get too mad to say anything, like as not he will out with the truth and tell you he was just born that way and he can't help it.

DURING Christmas time Maryland had two strong Clauses on its hands—Santa Clause and the grandfather clause.

IF A horse ever laughs it must be when he hears a Democrat advocating honest elections.

THE FINAL OFFICIAL

Several publications have been made purporting to give the official vote cast at the general election held on November 8, 1904. One of the latest of these was issued by the Associated Press, but even this usually accurate source was in error this time, as pointed out by the New York Tribune.

Tribune has now issued what will doubtless stand as the final revised and corrected table, and this will be the record of the election of 1904 as contained in the Tribune Almanac, which is published the first of the year. The Tribune points out that the Associated Press table had an error of 6,000 too many votes for Roosevelt in Vermont and about 10,000 short on the total vote for Debs, Socialist.

The Tribune Almanac, a standard political reference book since the days of Horace Greeley, will show the following totals cast for the various presidential parties in 1904, compared with the vote of 1900.:

Republican	7,220,077	7,620,33
Democratic	6,360,016	079,041
Prohibition	209,092	258,847
Social	92,142	402,159
S. Labor	33,375	33,612
Populist	50,080	113,258
Total	13,964,702	13,507,249

Thus it appears that the total vote of 1904 is 457,453 less than that cast in 1900. This shortage is due to the slump of the Democratic vote. Parker's total of 5,079,041 being 1,282,975 less than that cast for Bryan in 1900. All the other parties increasing their vote, Roosevelt's total being 400,255 in excess of McKinley's. The Prohibition increase was nearly 500,000, the Populist vote gained 63,228, the Socialist Labor remains about the same, while the Socialist vote jumps from 92,142 in 1900 to 402,159 in 1904. The Socialists are now the third party, Debs having received votes in every one of the 45 states, ranging from 22 votes in South Carolina to 69,225 in Illinois. The Prohibition vote also reached its highest mark in Illinois, 34,779, and Swallow received votes in every state except in Louisiana, Mississippi, Nevada, South Carolina and Utah.

Parker, who was the choice of the "reorganizers" and was to lead the party back to "safety and sanity" from the schools where Bryanism was alleged to have landed it, ran behind Bryan's vote in nearly every state of the Union, and his combined pluralities in the 13 southern states which he carried were only about 25,000 in excess of the pluralty given by Pennsylvania to Roosevelt.

Roosevelt's plurality is 2,541,291, as against McKinley's plurality of 860,061 in 1900, and his majority over all other candidates is 1,733,415 as against McKinley's majority of 475,452 four years ago.

HUTTON

There was no Sunday school here Sunday occasioned by the severe storm.

There seems to be a regular telegraphic mania in this place—all the kids in town being learners.

Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Glover were called to Huntington, W. Va., by telegram on Monday on account of the serious illness of their daughter Mrs. Beulah Christian.

This week opened with all signs of a good old fashioned New England winter. At 7 a. m. Monday the mercury stood at 5 below zero and the ground was covered with two feet of snow.

The Garrett Leather Company just made a shipment to Boston of 544 sides of sole leather weighing 16,260 lbs. it being probably the heaviest leather ever shipped from here.

Mrs. Rood, of Iowa, nee Sallie White, is spending a few weeks with friends here.

BITTINGER.

After the midwinter thaw, which brought the waters up to their normal level and graciously ended the distressing fall drouth, winter has again gathered the mountains in her icy embrace. The surface is again covered to a depth of two feet with beautiful sparkling snow, and on Sunday last this quiet little hamlet was wonderfully "snow bound."

The mail service to and from this place was suspended on last Saturday as a result of the blizzard that continued here during the closing days of the week.

State's Attorney F. A. Thaver and Attorney E. H. Sincell, of Oakland, were in this locality last week on professional business, and were entertained over night by Merchant C. E. Ellithorpe and family.

Dr. Russel H. Boyer and sister Miss Carrie, of Accident, droye over to this place Monday afternoon. Miss Boyer remaining the guest of Miss Amanda Ellithorpe over night, before going on to Jennings to resume her duties as teacher in the public school at that place.

Mr. Amos Bittinger of near Oakland, who with his son and two daughters were visiting friends and relatives about here for a few days, returned to their home last week.

Mr. William Engle returned to his post in Baltimore on Jan. 3rd. Mr. Engle was accompanied by Mrs. E. and their two daughters, Flora and Olive. The family will remain in the city for the winter, their residence at this place being now occupied by Rev. J. B. Shoup and his daughter, Miss Ruth.

News has reached us that ex-Deputy Sheriff S. O. Wiley has been appointed an assistant Deputy to serve as overseer of guards about the mines near Meyersdale, Pa.

Proverbs

"When the butter won't come put a penny in the churn," is an old time dairy proverb. It often seems to work though no one has ever told why.

When mothers are worried because the children do not gain strength and flesh we say give them Scott's Emulsion.

It is like the penny in the milk because it works and because there is something astonishing about it.

Scott's Emulsion is simply a milk of pure cod liver oil with some hypophosphites especially prepared for delicate stomachs.

Children take to it naturally because they like the taste and the remedy takes just as naturally to the children because it is so perfectly adapted to their wants.

For all weak and pale and thin children Scott's Emulsion is the most satisfactory treatment.

We will send you the penny, i. e., a sample free.

Be sure that this picture in the form of a label is on the wrapper of every bottle of Emulsion you buy.

AFTERMATH OF THE FIRE.

Those Burned Out Relocated in Other Quarters.

Since the fire which took place in Oakland last Thursday afternoon when the Pritchard building and the Lutheran church were both reduced to ashes and the residence of Mr. George F. Loughridge rendered untenable, those who lost their homes have secured other quarters and are now located as follows:

Mr. J. E. Bird and family and Miss Alice Hessen have rented the Dr. J. Lee McComas property on Liberty street.

Mr. G. H. Pritchard and family have gone to Mountain Lake Park where they will occupy the building owned by Mr. Wortman, of Ohio, a brother-in-law of Mr. Pritchard.

Mr. Loughridge and family are temporarily located the house of Mr. G. M. Mason where they will remain til the necessary repairs are made to Mr. Loughridge's house, work upon which is now progressing.

The merchants who removed their goods from their store rooms have adjusted their losses with the fire insurance companies and continuing business as before.

LETTERS CONFISCATED.

All Mail Put in Rural Delivery Boxes Must Bear Stamps.

Postmaster Hall of Bucyrus, Ohio, has a ruling from the government which is of interest to every community where the rural free delivery system is in force. A local carrier found in a mail box on his route two letters that were intended for the owner of the box, and had been put there by some one in passing. The letters were confiscated and sent to the government at Washington with a request for a ruling.

The government approved the action of the carrier, and said that all mail found in any box without stamps or the proper amount of money for postage must be collected and taken to the postoffice from which the route is operated and held for postage. This ruling means that the owner of the mail box has absolutely no control over it.

Church Services.

On next Sunday at Deer Park Rev. W. H. Faust will preach at 11 o'clock from the text "The Transfiguration," and at Thayerville Sunday evening at 7.30 from the subject "The Duties of Family Worship." All will find a cordial welcome.

Henderson, of Cumberland, was in Oakland last Saturday afternoon and evening, having come up here to hear arguments in one or two minor equity cases, returning to Cumberland on train No. 12 the same evening. Judge Henderson was accompanied here by Mr. DeWarren H. Reynolds, a member of the Allegany County Bar.

Pedestrians in Oakland this morning are forced to wade through an accumulation of snow and water almost shoe-top deep caused by the sudden change in temperature during the night which has resulted in melting the vast quantities of snow lying upon the streets and sidewalks. The water in some places clogged sewers and the roadways became rivers. The conditions were relieved to a great extent by the use of Mayor McComas' snow plow, which did good work.

Messrs. Wallace and Lee R. Mason, sons of Mr. and Mrs. George M. Mason, of Oakland, departed yesterday morning for Buckhannon, W. Va., where they will become students in the West Virginia Conference College. Both young men have the best wishes of their many friends in Oakland for the successful prosecution of their studies.

By a resolution adopted by the Ministerial Association of Wilkesbarre, Pa., the members of that organization voted to boycott all newspapers printing liquor advertisements. A committee was appointed to call upon the editors, demanding the suppression of such advertisements and a resolution advocating the publication of an anti-liquor paper was passed.

A firm of book publishers located at Washington, D. C., are endeavoring to get some of the innocents of Garrett county on their hook by sending out a gaudily printed and smoothly worded "certificate" nominating them as "Men of Mark of Maryland," along with a blank containing spaces to be filled up setting forth the many virtues of the recipients but omitting the vices. A lawyer of Oakland received one of these "certificates" recently and was so taken with the idea that he immediately had it framed and it now adorns the walls of his dwelling. After the work is published and a draft is made on the gentleman for the insertion of his autobiography his vanity will probably be satified and he will then be known as one of the "Easy Men of Mark of Maryland."

A New B. & O. 80-Mile Branch.

As soon as the weather permits the Baltimore and Ohio railroad will put more than 1,000 men to work building a road between Fairmont and Confluence, a distance of about 80 miles. The decision to build the line was reached following the report of freight experts who were sent to determine the increase in freight shipments from Fairmont during the last three years. They decided that if the freight business continues to keep up the ratio of increased maintenance for three years, the road will be unable to handle the business soon.

The road will run from Fairmont to Catawba, there crossing the Monongahela river and going to Morgantown, then east to Confluence. It is estimated that the road will cost $12,000,000 and that it will take three years to build it.

MARRIED

A very quiet wedding was celebrated in Oakland yesterday when Miss Mary Rebecca, daughter of Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord, became the bride of Mr. Thomas Edgar Briggs, of Montgomery county, Md. The ceremony was performed at the residence of Mr. Peddicord by Rev. J. B. Workman, of the Methodist church, in the presence of the members of the bride's family. The couple departed on train 46 for the home of the groom followed by the well wishes of the bride's many warm friends in Oakland.

GOV. LOWNDES LAID TO REST

Great Crowds in Attendance at the Funeral Held Yesterday at Cumberland.

BUSINESS IN CITY WAS SUSPENDED

People Unite in Paying a Last Tribute to the Deceased. — Impressive Service Held—Bishop Paret Assisted Rev. Mr. Jeffreys at Emmanuel P. E. Church.

Cumberland, Md., Jan. 11.—Followed by a host of sorrowing friends, the mortal remains of Ex-Gov. Lloyd Lowndes were laid to rest in Rose Hill Cemetery today. The services at the house, the church and the graveside were of an impressive character.

There was a general suspension of business in this city between the hours of 10 and 2 o'clock, and hundreds of townspeople gathered on the streets leading from the Lowndes home to Emmanuel Protestant Episcopal Church, and from there to Rose Hill Cemetery, to pay a last silent tribute to the deceased. Country people from miles around also journeyed here to visit the house and the church and to watch the passing of the cortege.

The public schools closed at 10:30 o'clock to permit teachers and scholars to attend the funeral. The Allegany County Academy suspended for the entire day.

Many prominent men came here in the special and regular trains from Baltimore, Washington, Annapolis, Philadelphia and New York.

Scores of vehicles of all kinds formed a seemingly endless line to carry mourners to the cemetery, and the floral tributes filled a dozen carriages.

The services at the house, which were held at 11 o'clock, were brief, and the cortege at once took up its solemn march through the crowds to the church, which is but a short distance away. A double row of policemen, under Mayor Clarence S. King, kept a path open for the mourners to the church door.

That edifice had been besieged by a great crowd an hour before the doors were opened, and it was a most difficult matter to discriminate between those who were best entitled to enter and others who were no less anxious to pay their tributes of sorrow at the services. Many who desired were unable to gain admission.

The scene inside the house of worship in whose interest the ex-Governor had played such an important and valued part during his life was one of deep solemnity.

In the church were the Rt. Rev. William Paret, bishop of Maryland; the rector of Emmanuel church, Rev. Edw. W. Jeffrey; Rev. Frederick B. Howden, of Georgetown, D. C., a former rector of Emmanuel church; Rev. William Dunbar Gould, of Baltimore, formerly of Lonaconing; Rev. J. C. Nicholson, of Washington, and Rev. E. B. Niver, of Baltimore.

Rev. Mr. Jeffreys led the funeral procession up the aisle, and was met by Bishop Paret in the chancel.

The bier was borne by Judge A. Hunter Boyd, Patrick H. Daughtrey, James Clark, D. James Blackiston, Calton L. Bretz, Roderic Clary, Dr. Richard Gerstell and David Davidson.

The casket was covered with light purple cloth, and oxidized silver handles ran the full length on either side. A silver plate on the lid bore the name of the deceased.

Mrs. Lowndes walked behind the casket with her brother-in-law, Mr. Richard T. Lowndes, Sr., Miss Elizabeth Lloyd Lowndes following with her uncle, Mr. H. Crawford Black, of Baltimore, Mr. Richard T. Lowndes, Jr., and Mr. Tasker Lowndes came next.

Others in the party of mourners were Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Lowndes, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. W. Bladen Lowndes, Mr. and Mrs. Charles T. Lowndes, Mr. and Mrs. E. St. George Lough, Mr. Frank J. McMahon, who had been the Governor's personal representative for over twenty years, and John F. Brown, the faithful colored valet, and several servants.

Then followed the honorary pallbearers, who were Gov. Edwin Warfield, Chief Justice Roger McSherry of the Maryland Court of Appeals, former Postmaster General James A. Gary; W. H. Dawson, of Baltimore; Judge Nathan Goff; James Cecil Quinn, of Chillicothe, O.; Daniel Annan, cashier of Second National Bank; Judge Robert R. Henderson, of Cumberland; J. Wirt Randall, of Annapolis; John V. L. Findlay, of Baltimore, and Warren Delano, of New York.

The Associated Merchants of Cumberland were represented at the funeral by a committee composed of ex-Postmaster Daniel E. Keen, A. P. Cross and Peter J. Seaver.

The Allegany county bar, of which Mr. Lowndes was a member, supplemented by a number of visiting attorneys from Garrett and Washington counties, attended in a body, as well as the officials and employees of the bank here and at Mount Savage, of which Mr Lowndes was president.

The service opened with the augmented surpliced choir singing Gould's "Through the Night of Doubt and Sorrow."

Rev. Mr. Howden read the office of the dead, while the prayers were offered by Bishop Paret. A psalm was read by the rector, and the service, simple but most impressive throughout, was brought to an end by the singing of the recessional "Ten Thousand Times Ten Thousand," by the choir.

At the conclusion of the services the cortege again moved through the crowded streets to Rose Hill Cemetery.

Despite the snow and sleet and the unbroken walks, many went to the cemetery. Every conveyance in town was used and a special car service was given by the Cumberland Electric Railway.

The grave was lined with evergreen and covered with a canopy, under which the clergymen and members of the family found shelter from the inclement weather.

The commitment was read by Rev. Mr. Jeffreys. Owing to indisposition, from which he had been suffering for some time, Bishop Paret did not go to the grave.

The services were simple, and when the grave had been filled it was completely covered with the magnificent floral tributes which had been received by the family since Sunday. The flowers were in such abundance that they filled the entire lot at the cemetery.

A cross of white roses and carnations from Miss Elizabeth Lloyd Lowndes was the only design placed on the casket.

The Lowndes family purchased the lot in which the ex-Governor is buried only recently. It overlooks a beautiful valley.

Previous to the removal of the remains to the church hundreds of people called at the house to take the last look. Many were from the mining region, all the mines in which Mr. Lowndes had an interest having suspended for the day. These included the four mines and the brickyard plant of the Union Mining Company, Mount Savage, of which Mr. Lowndes was president, and his son, W. Bladen Lowndes, is superintendent. The Allegany Furniture Works, in Cumberland, in which Mr Lowndes was a director, also suspended for the day.

GOOD WORK BY SNOW PLOW.

Pavements and Crossings Cleaned While You Wait.

Mayor McComas, during the present heavy snow saw the pressing need of some more practical method of removing the snow from pavements and crossings than by the laborious muscle and shovel method and set himself to work designing a plow which he had built and to which a horse was hitched Saturday afternoon which made the rounds and in a very remarkable short space of time the way was open to and from all important points in town.

The plow is made of three pieces of planking in the shape of a letter "V." At the point the horse is hitched and with a driver and one attendant who lends his weight to bury the plow into the snow rapid progress is made in removing the obstruction.

"Bill Nye" Mitchell and his faithful horse, and Policeman Sweeney are the "men behind the guns." Their services are greatly appreciated by a long suffering public.

FELL FORTY FEET.

And Escaped With No More Serious Injury Than a Broken Arm.

Last Friday afternoon Mr. John Flaherty who is employed by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company about the station at Mountain Lake Park, had a very narrow escape with his life last Friday afternoon. Among his duties is that of lighting lamps which are mounted on top of the signal towers at the Park. He had climbed to the top of the highest tower which measures forty feet, and was in the act of placing the lamp in position when his hold broke and he fell. In making the desecnt he involuntarily clutched at the spikes which constitute the ladder on the tower and was lucky enough to grab one which to some extent broke the force of his fall, escaping with a fracture to his right arm.

Local Institute.

The first of a series of local institutes will be held at Friendsville on Jan. 21, at which time interesting school subjects will be discussed. The program will appear in next week's paper. An educational and musical program will rendered on Friday evening by the pupils of the school. All teachers are expected to be at the institute who live in the surrounding districts and the public generally is invited.

Jesus Wins His First Disciples.

Origins always fascinate. Every Book of Genesis is attractive. This is the "beginning" of the Christian Church. The interest ordinarily attaching to the start of things is in this instance greatly enhanced by the sacred character of the institution, its phenomenal history, and its world-wide and beneficent effects. The story of the call of the first disciples is here told with a charming frankness and simplicity. The circumstances has been aptly called the cradle of the Church.

Jesus Himself had just come from the wilderness and the "naked and arid mountains of malediction." In that awful solitude, He had been with God for forty days. Glimpses and suggestions of the exercises of his soul are given us. He had struggled out into an understanding of His Divine mission, more or less clear. He had accepted it right royally. He had developed a general plan of procedure to which He faithfully adhered to the close of His career.

It was no fortuitous incident that Jesus came to the place where John was baptizing. He came to the fords of the Jordan as to a human quarry, from which he could select living stones as the foundation of that spiritual structure He intended to rear. Nor was He disappointed. He found five out twelve of His appostles there.

When John the Baptist saw Jesus coming, he recognized Him as the Messiah, the latchet of whose shoes he felt himself unworthy to unloose. He gave the Master a respectful, but at the same time a joyous, welcome, and unequivocally cast the full weight of his phenomenal influence upon the side of the new Teacher, no shade of jealousy crossed his noble heart. Looking and pointing, he cried, "Behold the Lamb of God!" A brief sentence but long enough to tell the story of the Divine paternity and pity. The next day, on the reappearance of Jesus (not accidental, but designed), John repeated his significant exclamation with even increased emphasis. It was a practical dismission of his own disciples, concerning which John and Jesus may have consulted and arrived at an understanding. It is as John had been saying to his own followers, "Whoever wishes to leave me now and attach himself to this greater Teacher, is at a full liberty to do so." Two of the choicest spirits among his converts take the hint and separate themselves forever from John to follow Jesus. The Nazarene hears their footsteps, and turning, encourages them with look and word. They are drawn to Him, as iron to the magnet. Under the fresh-cut boughs of a pilgrim-booth, or in the cool depths of some grotto, they sit at His feet, and learn of Him, their hearts burning within them as He unfolds to them the principles of His kingdom. Then and there was kindled in the human soul of Jesus that love which made John evermore His bosom companion. Andrew coveted his brother's superior abilities for the service of his new-found Master. He rested not until he had communicated to him his momentous "find," and had brought him to Jesus. The next day he saw the addition of the fourth disciple in the person of Philip, who showed the spirit of a true convert by immediately bringing another to Jesus in the person of the guileless Israelite, Nathanael (Bartholomew).

From this circumstance the paragraph has been well called a chapter of eurekas, a series of findings—Jesus finds disciples. They find their friends. "We have found!" one of the most impressive declarations of the Bible.

Mosaic from Commentaries.

Two disciples: Account of an eye-witness one named subsequently: habitual reserve concerning himself accounts for his silence.—Camb. Bib. The giving of one name suggesting a personal reserve in regard to the other.—Lange. Looked upon Jesus: Eye steadily and continuously directed toward Him.—Lange. As He walked: Took leave after coming to an understanding respecting their conduct toward each other.—Ibid. Next day: Upon the testimony of the first day the two disciples of John did not follow Jesus. Felt it involved departure from old master. Next day was the day of their calling and decision. Behold the Lamb: Disciples of John yesterday had heard the same words. No doubt some explanation had followed. Repetition of words all that was necessary to cause the disciples to go personally to the Lord.—Lange. Followed Jesus. Profound reverence in expectation of great things.—Ibid. What seek ye? Question not so much designed to test their motives as to relieve their embarrassment.—New Century. Anticipating, yet meeting, their seeking.—Lange. Where abidest Thou? Inquiry showed that in coming to Jesus they were seeking personal communion with Him.—New Century. Nor seeking something from Him, but Himself, an intimation that they wish to speak to Him in quiet.—Lange. Come and see: Unmistakable allusion to rabbinical formula.—Ibid. Come, and ye shall see.—Camb. Bib. Gracious invitation, straightway accepted.—New Century. Tenth hour: Four o'clock P. M.—New Century. First hour of his Christian life indelibly fixed upon the memory of John.—Lange. Found the Messiah: Great and joyful eureka: Excepted forty centuries.—Ibid. Beheld Him: penetrating look: mental miracle: Immediate discerner of character.—Ibid. Follow Me: An invitation to traveling companionship. How much Philip understood of it at the time, impossible to say. Much or little, he was not disobedient.—Ibid. Good out of Nazareth: Not objection, but astonishment.—Ibid. Come and see: Watchword of the Christian faith.—Ibid, Verily: Hebrew amen. Heaven opened: Now are heaven and earth become one thing, and it is as if ye sat above and the holy angels ministered to you.—Luther.

The Teacher's Lantern.

There were "calls" and "calls"—calls in Judea and afterwards in Galilee. Preliminary and final calls. When this is borne in mind there is no conflict in accounts. Discrepancies are in appearance only.

From the probationary calls the disciples were afterward dismissed to attend to their worldly affairs, and while doing so in their old and familiar environments, and free from excitement of novel situations, to think on what they had seen and heard. Their third and last call is recorded in Luke v. 1-11. These calls were progressive.

Andrew, after finding Peter, practically drops from the narrative, being only mentioned in an incidental way later. He is one of the inconspicuous apostles, yet his name is as deeply graven on the foundations of the New Jerusalem as any of the twelve. No doubt he wrought well and nobly, but to have brought Peter, alone would have achieved immortality for him.

Honorable doubts can always be overcome by the facts of experience. The challenge is still ringing, "Come and see!" The experimental test is the truest and most satisfactory of all. There is no substitute for it.

Friendships may yet be utilized for the kingdom of God, as Philip's for Nathaniel was.

Jesus calls. He does not force. It is the paradox of history that men ever believe that the kingdom of peace could be established by the weapons of war.

The kingdom of heaven, in its essence, consists in a state of the human soul. It is subjective, not objective; spiritual, not material. It can only find entrance and growth by the consent of the individual. That was a monstrous sight —the Roman "Christians" holding the drawn sword over the kneeling "heathen" tutors while they baptized them.

There is a fadeless attractiveness in this old picture. Jesus is not a monarch with a rod of iron, but a Man with human sympathies.

It was about the tenth hour. John could never forget the precise time of day when he went in to the Lord's humble shelter, and heard Him speak as man never did. It was "quarter of nine o'clock in the evening" when Wesley first felt his heart strangely warmed. But this precision of memory need not trouble any one who lacks it. Because you can not name the particular hour when you learned to read, does not vitiate the fact of your ability to read. Many can read their heavenly titles who can not say when they first began to read them.

There is a vast difference between mediate and immediate knowledge of Jesus. The former comes through secondary sources, Scripture, and testimony of others. The latter is direct and conscious communion with the Lord.

The call is for greater moral earnestness in social relations. The aim of friendship is not possessing entertainment. The question is, What do I stand for in the eye of my friend? What do I interpret to him?

Notice of Dissolution.

Notice is hereby given that the firm of "W. H. Bartlett," carrying on the retail grocery business in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, and composed of William Harper Bartlett and F. T. Martin, has discontinued business. All persons indebted to said firm will make payment to F. T. Martin, who will pay all the debts against said firm.

The public is hereby notified not to trust or credit said firm, or said William Harper Bartlett on account of said firm, and that I will not be responsible for further debts contracted by him or said firm.

Mouse Nest and Mare's Nest

By GEORGE SIDNEY

Copyright, 1904, by T. C. McClure

Berwynd's defalcation was only $1,500, but had he looted the subtreasury of as many millions Boontown could not have been more shocked.

It was not so much the loss of the money to the Boontown First National; that was but an incident. It was the fact that Chet Berwynd should have been guilty at all. For generations the Berwynds had been among the leaders of Boontown society, and it was regarded as a matter of course that Chet should have been made cashier and paying teller when the bank was started.

Some of those who had known Chester Berwynd's father refused at first to believe the charge, but in the end circumstantial evidence proved too strong to be ignored, and, though Hank Simmons, the town constable, had a suspicious moisture in his eyes, he led Chet over to the little village lockup and left him in a cell, promising that a rocking chair and other unprisonlike conveniences should be sent over from his own home as soon as possible. Hank had never forgotten how old Dr. Berwynd had worked for twelve hours over his little daughter when she had had the membranous croup, though he had just returned from a long ride into the country.

One did not have to go back to Chet's father for acts of kindness. As boy and man Chet had always been ready to give his aid to others, with no thought of return, and his incarceration was a shock to the community.

Even after the venerable John Hollis had explained that there was a package of five $100 bills and two $500 certificates which no one could account for save Chet, who had denied all knowledge of the money, there were those who refused to believe that Dr. Berwynd's son could be guilty.

Foremost among these was Gertrude Hollis, who set aside even her father's opinion to declare herself openly a partisan of Chet, and it was one of the things that shook her father's faith in his own judgment. Judge Hollis was a believer in woman's intuition.

It was this which induced him to hurry the trial in the hope that some evidence would turn up whereby the accused cashier might clear himself, and there was none more pleased when, two days before the trial, it was discovered that rats had stolen the package and had made a nest of the crisp paper.

Gertrude discovered the nest in a cranny under the cashier's desk. She communicated her "find" to her father, who was also president of the bank.

It made an insignificant little mass, this expensive nest; but, while the masticated particles were too small to be redeemed by the treasury department, it was plain to be seen that the nest was composed of bills. The nest was duly brought forward at the trial and was sufficient to acquit.

Chester was the only one dissatisfied with the acquittal, and that evening he called at the Hollis home. Gertrude met him with an apology for her father, for whom the excitement of the trial had been too much.

"It was you I came to see," returned Chester. "I want to ask you a question."

The red flashed into Gertrude's face. There had been no open courtship, but it had seemed to her that there was but one question Chester would want to ask. Her heart beat high, but the next moment her hopes were dashed.

"Where did you really find that nest?" he demanded.

"I told you this morning at the trial," she declared. "It was in the little cubbyhole under your desk."

"Whatever made you look there?" he asked curiously.

"I supposed that I had a right to feel curious," she said defiantly. "It was my father's bank, and I had heard of how bills were stolen by rats at various times. I thought I would look around your desk."

"May I see the nest?" he asked curiously. "They let you keep it, did they not?"

She flushed, but she crossed to a writing desk and drew from it a small, almost shapeless mass, on the outside of which were tiny particles, barely large enough for the "C" or "100" to be distinguished. Chet looked at it curiously. It was all that had stood between him and prison.

"Do you know," he said softly, "that this looks more as though it had been made of Confederate money?"

She flung up her head. "You didn't say so this morning."

"I did not see it this morning," he protested. "The only expert opinion given was by your brother, who pronounced them to be genuine bills. There are no silk threads in these bills and not a trace of the yellow backed gold certificates."

"I didn't have any yellow ones," she said, off her guard for the instant. He caught her wrist.

"Do you mean," he demanded, "that you made this?"

"I couldn't see you go to jail," she said, tears trembling on her lashes.

"Did you think I was guilty?" he demanded.

She shook her head. "I couldn't think that of you," she said simply, "but things looked so black against you, and I remembered stories of mice building nests—and I—I fixed this up."

He was so close to her that she could feel his quick breath on her forehead.

"Did you do this because you were sorry?" he asked.

She raised her head bravely.

"Not because I was sorry."

"Because you loved me?"

Her blushes were her answer. In a moment his strong arms were about her and she had hidden her burning face upon his shoulder. How long they stood there neither knew. It was Judge Hollis who interrupted them. There were new lines of care in his face as he came slowly forward from the doorway.

"Chester," he said slowly, "God knows how I have been hoping that some day your union with Gertrude would give me the right to call you 'son.' I have looked forward to the day with no thought of what would have come before. You are cleared in our eyes, but while this hangs over you it is not well that you should marry."

With a cry Gertrude sank upon the sofa. Chester bent over and kissed her, then turned to her father.

"You are right, judge," he said. "Until this is cleared to our own satisfaction it is better so." He turned slowly to the door, to be jostled violently by Jack Hollis.

"I've run all the way from the bank," shouted the lad. "We found the bills in the trial balance book. Old Dixon used them for a bookmark and then forgot all about them."

Chester gasped.

"And I thought all the time you had them," he cried. "Don't you remember handling them the afternoon they were missed?"

Jack almost sobbed.

"Did you keep quiet for me—or for Sis?"

"For Sis!" answered Chester quietly.

And this time the judge gave them his blessing.

His Only Victory.

"Rarely, very rarely," asserted a west side resident, "do I repeat to a friend something that I've been saying to another friend. But I did say a good thing to my wife the other day. Generally I don't indulge in repartee with her. Ideas come to her more rapidly than they do to me. This was an exceptional case. I'll agree that women are pretty sensible in most things, but in some things they're unreasonable, especially in money matters. They have to make a little money go so far themselves that they imagine it can be stretched until it accomplishes wonders. My wife was discussing a new servant. 'I don't wonder that folks are poor,' she said haughtily. 'I get out of all patience with them, they're so careless and improvident. Do you know this girl of ours had to walk up here? She didn't even have car fare.'

"'Didn't you tell me,' I asked, 'that this girl worked in a hotel for $3.50 a week, that she had to pay $1.50 for a room, that her washing cost her a dollar a week, and that she had to clothe herself and look neat on a dollar a week?'

"'Yes,' she admitted.

"'Well,' I said, 'what did you expect she'd have—a bank account?'

"We've been married fourteen years, and this was the first time that my wife didn't get back at me and make me sorry I'd spoken. I put on a swagger that evening that made the house look too small for me."—Providence Journal.

Great Echoes.

The suspension bridge across the Menai straits, in Wales, produces one of the most remarkable echoes in the world. The sound of a blow with a hammer on one of the main piers is returned in succession from each of the crossbeams which support the roadway, and from the opposite pier at the distance of 576 feet, in addition to which the sound is many times repeated between the water and roadway at the rate of twenty-eight times in five seconds.

An equally remarkable echo is that of the castle of Simonetta, a nobleman's seat about two miles from Milan. The report of a pistol is repeated by this echo sixty times. A singular echo is also heard in a grotto near Castle Comber, in Ireland. In the garden of the Tuileries, in Paris, is an artificial echo which repeats a whole verse without the loss of a single syllable.

Another wonderful echo is heard outside the Shipley church, in Sussex, which echoes some twenty syllables in the most perfect manner.

The well known echo at Woodstock repeats itself no fewer than fifty times. In one part of the Pantheon so great is the echo that the striking together of the palms of the hands is said to make a report equal to that of a twelve pound cannon.—London Globe.

Bowser Aids Tramps

He Refuses One a Dime, and Then His Conscience Accuses Him—Sees Sad Fate For the Hobo and Plays the Good Samaritan.

[Copyright, 1904, by T. C. McClure.]

MR. BOWSER had been reading his evening paper for a quarter of an hour when he laid it aside with a sigh and began walking up and down the room. Mrs. Bowser watched him for awhile, saw that he had something on his mind and finally inquired:

"Has anything happened during the day to bother you?"

"Nothing of a business nature," he answered, "but as I got off the car this evening a little thing happened that has kept me thinking. A tramp who was shivering with cold and looked as if he hadn't had a square meal for three days came up and struck me for 10 cents."

"And you gave him a quarter, of course?"

"No. I had had a row with the conductor and was mad, and I told the tramp that he ought to be arrested."

"Well?"

"Well, he slunk away, and I came along, but the look of reproach he gave me has been like an accusing voice. I am ashamed of myself. It was a heartless thing to do."

"Your conscience needn't cry out too loudly," she observed. "After cook had fed three great big tramps today along came a fourth one. She wanted him to carry a bundle of scum out of the back yard, but he very pointedly assured her that he was not in the labor market. He may have been the same man who gave you such a heartbroken look."

"I know that the average tramp is deserving of no sympathy, but there are cases where a good man may have to appeal to charity. Suppose the man who spoke to me had a wife and children wanting bread. What bitterness he must have felt in his heart when I so cruelly turned him down! He knew that I had money in my pocket and that a dime was the merest trifle to me, and yet I showed him that I did not care whether he starved or lived on."

"You may meet him again some day, and you can get even by handing him a double portion. Shall we have a game of cards this evening to pass away the time?"

"Certainly not. Do you take me for a man of iron? I have just been telling you that my conscience accuses me of wronging a fellow being who may be found dead on the street before morning, and you calmly turn around and ask me if we shan't have a game of cards. Woman, have you a heart of stone?"

"I have fed more tramps than you ever saw, and if there is one left who has not called at the basement door I am not going to worry myself about it."

"No, you wouldn't worry if half the town was starving to death, but I happen to have a different feeling. Here we are, warm, cozy and surrounded with every luxury. I have over a hundred dollars in my pocket and expect to close a deal tomorrow whereby I shall make twice as much, and yet when a starving, freezing man comes up to me and asks for the merest pittance I refuse it. It isn't right, Mrs. Bowser—it is far from right."

"If you have a hundred dollars in your pocket, why not give me a couple to buy handkerchiefs? I have only one left. Your wife ought to come before a tramp."

"There you go, twisting and criticising!" he shouted. "We were talking about a starving man—a man with a wife and children wanting for bread; a man who has been looking for work for years and years and failed to find it; a man who has probably gone off to throw himself into the river because of man's inhumanity to man, and you coolly drag handkerchiefs into the discussion. By gum, but you make me so mad that I want to kill somebody!"

"I simply said that I had only one handkerchief left to my name, and that had a hole in it," she quietly replied.

The cat came out from under the lounge with a grin on his face, and Mr. Bowser stood and looked at his wife for a long minute. Then he uttered a "humph" and started down the hall and donned his overcoat and hat.

"Are you going out?" queried Mrs. Bowser.

He "humphed" again for reply and passed out, and the cat meowed two or three times and crept back under the lounge to finish her nap and await further developments. Mr. Bowser had an idea to carry out, and fortune favored him. He reached the corner, where he had left the street car and been accosted to find four men hanging about, and one of them was the very chap who had struck him for a dime. There was no mistaking his lop shoulder and sandy hair and whining voice.

"My man, didn't you ask me for a dime about two hours ago?" was queried of him.

"Yes, I think I did," was the reply.

"And I turned you down, for which I am sorry. You must have thought me a brute?"

"I did," was the blunt reply, although the tramp was puzzled to know what was coming.

"Well, I'm here to show you that I'm not. Come down to the house and get a bite to eat, and we will talk of money matters and your starving wife and children later on. Who are these other men?"

"They are also poor fellows with starving wives and children."

"Then come along, boys."

Mr. Bowser appeared at his basement door with five objects of charity behind him, and when the cook greeted him with a look of mingled wonder and indignation he said to her:

"You can go upstairs, and I will attend to these men myself. I presume there are some cold victuals left?"

"Is it a charity hall you are to open to such as them?" she asked.

"Never mind, my good woman, but run right along."

The cook disappeared upstairs, growling as she went, and Mr. Bowser explored the refrigerator and the pantry and set out everything he could find that was eatable. The tramps looked on in wonder, though nudging and winking at each other at intervals, and by and by they were told to sit down at the table and fill up. There was no delay on their part, and for the first five minutes Mr. Bowser's face was beaming. He felt that he had cleared his conscience in great shape. Then, addressing himself to the lop shouldered, sandy haired man, he said:

"When you asked me for a dime this evening why did you not tell me that you had a starving wife and children?"

"I—I forgot!" replied the fellow, with his mouth full of food.

At that two others began to giggle and chuckle, and as the good Samaritan looked at them for an explanation one of them roared out and then said:

"Boys, he's the most innercent old guy we ever struck! Think of our starving wives and children and then think of this fodder before us!"

There was laughter and pounding on the table, and one of the "patients" suggested that Mr. Bowser should get the wine ready. The scales fell from his eyes, his face reddened up with his rising temper, and he was about to make a remark when the five men suddenly burst into hilarious song. It was a song about "Maggie Murphy's Home," and Mrs. Bowser hadn't time to judge of its merits when it was interrupted.

There was a great hullabaloo in the basement. There were crashes and smashes and whoops and swear words. The cook came running downstairs, and the cat came scooting out from his retreat, and for three or four minutes confusion reigned. Then the sound of footsteps galloping away were heard, and then came silence.

The two women descended to the basement to find the table overturned and the chairs upset, and lying on the floor of the hall in the most dilapidated condition was Mr. Bowser. He had met the enemy, and he was theirs.

"He might have known it!" exclaimed the cook.

"But he has cleared his conscience," replied Mrs. Bowser, "and we will try to get him upstairs and poultice him back to life." M. QUAD.

The Molar He Saved.

"It is too bad you could not have saved the tooth," remarked the teacher to Tommy when he rejoined his class after having a molar extracted.

"Sure, I saved it!" was the triumphant reply as he fished the gory trophy from his pocket.—New York Press.

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

Miss Minnie Stemple, one of Garrett county's most talented and cultured teachers spent Saturday night and Sunday with frends and relatives here. It is ever a pleasure to have this clever young lady with us. Come often, Miss Minnie, you will always find the latch string hanging out and a royal welcome from everyone.

Mrs. Alice Young, the wife of our fellow citizen and neighbor who was a valiant soldier in the Union army, passed quietly away at her home near here at the close of last week. She was a fine woman and much loved and admired by her many friends.

Miss Alma Crane, the efficient and popular assistant teacher at this place, was kept at her home in Mountain Lake Park Monday by the deep snow. During her absence Miss Vauda Thrasher occupied her place very acceptably. Miss Vauda shows remarkable talent as a teacher and bids fair to stand high in this profession some day.

Mrs. L. D. Thrasher, the wife of our clever and accommodating postmaster, spent a few days the first of the week in Oakland where she visited her niece, Mrs. Felty. She returned on Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Hennen are on an extended visit to Keyser, W. Va., their former home. Mrs. H is a true daughter of Virginia, and during his stay in our midst Engineer Hennen has won his way into our hearts. It is both pleasant and profitable to have such a splendid family in our county.

Death has again visited our little village and claimed as a victim Mr. Mike Madigan, one of our oldest citizens. He was a faithful man, a kind neighbor and true friend. Peace to his ashes.

Mrs. J. Snider was taken suddenly very ill last Sabbath morning and has been real sick for several dayt, but is fast recovering her usual health. Her husband also has been confined to his room for several days past. May they both soon be their usual selves again.

Mr. Edward Gustavus Miller has also been on the sick list for the last week. His presence is greatly missed on the streets and we hope that he will soon be with us again with his pleasant greeting and hearty handclasp.

Prof. Browning, our prominent young principal of the public school here, was unable to get home Saturday and Sunday last on account of the heavy snow. It is a rare pleasure to have this cultured young man remain over with us.

Rev. Percy W. Metheney, a recent graduate of West Virginia Conference Seminary, arrived here Friday afternoon and has taken up the work on the Mt. Lake Park circuit. He delived his first sermon to a good congregation Sunday morning, his subject, being "And as ye go Preach." He is a very zealous young man and will doubtless add greatly to the ministerial corps in Garrett county.

BRUCETON BANK TO BUILD

Structure to be Erected for Bank Over in West Virginia Which is Controlled by Garrett Countians.

The Bruceton Bank, which is controlled by residents of Garrett county will soon have a home of its own, work upon which will begin as soon as weather conditions will permit.

The plans which have already been adopted for the building contemplate a stone structure which will have all modern improvements, such as a fire and burglar proof vault and Mosler safe.

The board of directors elected on Tuesday of this week is composed of the following gentlemen well known in this and Preston county, W. Va.: L. E. Friend, Dr. J. S. Nedrow, John H. Cuppett, Jeremiah Thomas, D. S. Custer, W. H. Miller, John W. McCullough, Vestes Thomas, W. W. Savage, M. A. Wolf, A. K. Frazee, Noah Thomas, H. M. Rumbaugh, W. H. H. Friend and R. C. McCandlish.

The officers are L. E. Friend, president; C. R. Bartlett, cashier; R. C. McCandlish and Jeremiah Thomas, vice presidents.

This bank has been in existence but one year. Its deposits amount to $46,009 with a surplus fund of $1,000.

MORE ROBBERS CAUGHT.

Stephen Piper and Henry Titchnell Arrested Last Friday.

Last Friday, D. R. Jackson and C. W. Fawcett, went down to John Metheny's where they arrested two more of the store thieves. They got Stephen Piper and Henry Titchenell's boy. They found goods on them that they had stolen on their trip. They had broken open the Lake Terra Alta Hotel and stolen a Winchester rifle belonging to W. H. Glover and had broken into a house over at Swallow Falls, Md., and stolen two more guns, one they threw in the river below the falls. They also broke into a ware room to a little store in Maryland and had stolen twenty-four pounds of coffee. Piper, when brought here acknowledged to the whole thing and said he was wearing a pair of pants which he had bought of John Methany.

W. H. Glover of Terra Alta was here last Saturday and identified some of the articles as his also an old gentleman whose name we did not learn, from Swallow Falls was here and said some of the articles were his.

On Monday, Metheney's father and mother, went on his bond for his appearance at court and he was released, but Jeff and Sim Davis, Stephen Piper and Henry Titchenel, are still in jail and will likely remain there as they cannot give bond—Kingwood Journal.

Large Tracts of Land for Sale.

In this issue of THE REPUBLICAN the Cumberland Paper Company, by its attorney, Mr. Lloyd Lowndes, Jr., of Cumberland, advertises at public sale 1480 acres of land lying in Garrett county, which will take place in front of the postoffice on Saturday, January 21st, at the hour of 10.30 o'clock a. m. Two of the tracts are cleared and will make excellent farms, while one of them is heavily timbered.

STILL JUPMING ON PARKER.

Some of Parker's old newspaper supporters are still jumping on that unfortunate person. One of them points out that in the "thirteen Southern States, including Maryland, in which Parker electors were chosen, the total vote was 2,033,226," while in the "thirty-two States, excluding Maryland, in which Roosevelt electors were chosen, the total vote was 11,475,270." Thus, while Parker got 34 per cent of the electors, his States was only 15 per cent. of the total popular vote. Parker's aggregate plurality in the thirteen Southern State was only 25,000 more than Roosevelt's plurality in Pennsylvania.

This is a bad showing for Parker. It would be still worse if Maryland had been counted for the Republicans as a plurality of its voters intended it should be.

Lutheran Sunday School.

The Lutheran Sunday School will be held in the Garrett Memorial church next Sabbath morning at the usual hour—9.30 o'clock, to which all are cordially invited.

January 1, Sunday.

The new year 1905 began on a Sunday, being the first in series of fourteen such openings which will occur during the twentieth century. In this century January 1 will fall on Sunday as follows: The common years 1905, 1911, 1922, 1933, 1939, 1950, 1961, 1967, 1978, 1989 and 1995, and the leap years 1928, 1956 and 1984. This is a fraction less than the usual number computed in point of averages, the first and the last of the Sunday beginnings falling five years each from the close of the century. It is possible for January 1 to occur on Sunday fifteen times in a single century.

A Card of Thanks.

SOME FAMOUS SIEGES.

Many Were Of Greater Duration Than That Of Port Arthur.

A siege always has its element of excitement and romance. It is a contest of mental as well as of physical forces. The siege of Port Arthur, which so vividly interested the whole world, brings to mind many of the famous sieges of history. Since May 13 last the town had been shut off from the world by an army of marvelous size and equipment, and the beleaguered people within had suffered untold hardships.

And yet this is an exceedingly short siege compared to some of which we read. Before the Christian era Greece camped nine years on the Trojan plain before she "burned the topless towers of Ilium." Rome, with her primitive battering rams and wooded weapons, pricked 10 years at the walls of Veli before her eagles were triumphant. And her splendid legions were held at bay for two years before Scipio at last stood as conqueror among the ruins of Carthage. During those two frightful years the women of the city, in mortal terror of the "wolves from the Tiber," worked shoulder to shoulder with the men in the trenches.

In more recent years the siege of Sebastopol, in the Crimean War, easily takes precedence for daring and picturesque acheivement. For 11 months the smoke of battle hung like a halo over the Redan and the Malakoff, those supposedly impregnable forts.

The year 1857 was made memorable by the siege of Lucknow. Here in this city of glittering Oriental beauty 300 English soldiers with the indomitable spirit of the Anglo-Saxon, beat back the hordes of Sepoys that swarmed about the residency, while the women, knowing their fate if surrender came, prayed every hour for death or rescue. Four months of this slow torture went by, and despair began to settle on the garrison; defeat seemed inevitable, when one day a new sound mingled with the noises the garrison already knew, and a Scotch lassie, with her ear to the ground, recognized the new note and cried out the rescue to the others: "It is the pibrochs o' the Highlanders! We are saved, we are saved!" And in the music of those pipes that gallant band of Scots and English cut their way to their starving countrymen, leaving behind a path of blood thick strewn with Sepoy dead.

In the Franco-Prussian War Paris held the enemy back for 132 days, yielding at last not to assault, but to save her children from the horrors of starvation. Then there is Plevna. Here the Turks, under Osman Pasha, intrenched themselves against the Russians, and in the 142 days of siege that followed 70,000 men gave up their lives. Then the Pasha capitulated. The siege and capture of Plevna make interesting reading for the student of military tactics.

In the history of our own country sieges are rare. There was the so-called siege of Boston, the 20 days of Yorktown, which closed the Revolution, and in the Civil War the siege of Vicksburg, which city held out against Grant for several days. During much of this time the people of the town lived in their cellars or burrowed into the bluffs and cliffs to escape the bursting shells of the assailants. During the Spanish-American War there befell the siege of Santiago, too familiar for more than mention. During the Boer War in South Africa people all over the world asked for 118 days, "What is the news from Ladysmith?" for during that length of time Ladysmith was holding out against the beleaguering foe.

These are some of the famous sieges of history, ancient and modern. Each one of them had its own record of brave deeds, of gallant sallies, of bloody assaults; each one ended with its sigh of despair, its far-blown bugle call of victory. Chronologists have set them down coldly and succinctly, poets and orators have told of them in words that burn. But the story of each will probably fade in interest and vivid picturesqueness when the history of Port Arthur is told to the world, for in those other days there were wooden walls and spears, and man propelled battering rams; or at best, guns of but primitive power.

Judge Hoke's Court

Justice at Sandy Bend Receives a Black Eye.

"IN sayin' that I open this yere court this mornin' the same as I would open a funeral," said Judge Hoke as he rapped for order and motioned for the constable to fling three Chinamen outdoors—"in sayin' this I'm only expressin' what I feel. Instead of bein' a hilarious occashun, as pervided by the statoots of Wyoming, it's an occashun fur gloominess and tears and fur axin' each other whar we are headed fur.

"Some time ago this court had before it the case of Hogan varsus Doyle. Bill Hogan, who plays a good game of poker, but ain't wuth shucks at anything else, goes out of my Red Dog saloon one evenin' to straddle a hoss be-

"It's no use tryin' to describe our feelin's, fur it can't be done. I appealed to Joe with tears in my eyes not to bring disgrace upon the fair name of our commonwealth, but he continued to screech fur jestice till I issued the warrant.

"Bill Hogan was brung into court, and Joe Doyle was thar to look him in the face. This court didn't go accordin' to law and evidence, but accordin' to jestice. It turned Bill Hogan loose with a warnin' to behave his future conduct, and it sent Joe Doyle to jail fur three months fur bein' a squaw man without any sand. Joe would have took them three months and said nuthin', but along comes a shyster lawyer and appeals the case, and a higher court reverses it on me and orders a new trial.

"Thar won't be any. Bill is in state's prison in Utah, and Joe is in jail in Iowa, but ar' thar a man in this courtroom who don't feel degraded and disgraced by this reversal? We might as well put on coats and petticoats and throw our guns away. It degrades the American eagle into a buzzard, and it makes the sacred name of Bunker Hill a byword.

"And thar's a second case," resumed his honor as he got the better of his emotions. "Two months ago Tom Davis come down from the hills. He'd bin havin' bad luck fur several weeks—that is, every time he held threes some of the other boys would hold straights or flushes.

"When he reached this enterprisin' town of Sandy Bend he had jest 10 cents in his clothes, and he paid it to me over the bar of the Red Dog. Next day it struck him that he'd better get his shirt washed after three months of hard usage. He borrows an old shirt of somebody and takes his own up to Sing Lee's washhouse and hands it in. There was nuthin' in his appearance to lead one to doubt his financial ability, but that squint eyed heathen looked from him to the shirt and says cash in advance.

"This court ain't sayin' that Tom Davis has got the fine feelin's of a widder woman, but it do contend that he's got feelin's enough to know when a blow is struck through him at the bulwarks of American liberty. When told that he must pay in advance to get a shirt washed all the sentiment and manhood in his soul riz up, and he took the heathen by the neck.

"That was as it should be and as this court would have advised, but, alas, what spectacle presented itself to the eyes of us patriots five minutes later. Sing Lee not only refused to be choked, but he insisted on doing a little of the chokin' himself. In other words, he was too much fur Tom and within five minutes was runnin' him right through the town and into the bushes.

"That was the day of degradashun for Sandy Bend. A cry of indignashun went up at sight of a heathen chasin' a white man, and this yere court was one of the first to offer Tom Davis a gun to retrieve his reputation. It ain't in the statoots of Wyoming that he should have taken a gun and walked back to that washhouse and made that heathen lick his boots and beg a thousand pardons, but we've got to let law slide now and then and go by custom. Tom didn't accept of a gun. He didn't go back to the washhouse, even to claim the shirt still lyin' at the door. He comes skulkin' around to me, and in a voice that was plaintive he yells out fur jestice.

"Great snakes, but think of it! Run out of town by a heathen and then become sneakin' back to ask fur a warrant fur assault and battery! Is thar a man in this room who wouldn't turn over in his grave if dead and hearin' of sich a smirch on the manhood of this town? If Christopher Columbus was still livin' kin any of you doubt that he'd be ashamed of ever diskiverin' sich a kentry?

"Excuse this emoshun, but I can't conceal it. When Tom Davis called fur jestice I had to give it to him. I ain't sayin' what my feelin's was toward him, but I went ahead and issued the warrant and called the case. Most of you attended the trial and heard and saw what happened. Sing Lee stuck out fur it that he was actin' in self defense, and Tom Davis even admitted that he was the first to lay on hands. When it come to his bein' run out of town he hadn't any better excuse than to say that he lost his sand all to once.

"Sing Lee couldn't be punished accordin' to law, and Tom had no case accordin' to law, but had I let matters end thar it would have been diggin' the grave of manhood fur a hundred years to come. I hinted to the heathen that he'd better pay the costs and go back to his washhouse, and he did so. As fur Tom, I sent him to jail fur a year. I don't say it was law and I'm not askin' anybody else to say so, but I do say that if I'd done any other way the ghosts of them who fell at Lexington would have been as thick as flies around the back door of my saloon. The sentence pleased everybody, even Tom hisself.

"And now comes the higher court and reverses my decision and orders a new trial. Jestice are set aside, and law must prevail. Right yere in this courtroom I've got to chaw my words and let Tom Davis loose to be run out of other towns by other heathens. It's got to be done, and I'm goin' to do it, and it's needless to say that I'm expectin' your sympathy and wantin' to feel that it hurts you as much as it hurts me.

"I am now sayin' to Tom, who sits over thar lookin' like a sheep thief, that he's turned loose and clear of the law, and I'm also addin' that if he's spry on his feet he kin git beyond the town limits in fifteen minutes. If he's found among us after that time then thar will be a circus in Sandy Bend, and he'll do most of the performin'.

"We will now adjourn and git up a dog fight to assuage our sorrers."

VOLUME 28. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1905. NUMBER 47

THE BOUNDARY LINE CASE DISMISSED.

Garrett County Commissioners Abandon Contention Concerning Line.

BETWEEN THE TWO COUNTIES.

Papers Were Almost Completed and Ready for Filling In Higher Court When Order Was Passed Dismissing It

The case of the County Commissioners of Garrett county vs. The Consolidation Coal Company, appealed to the Court of Appeals of Maryland from a decision rendered early last fall by Chief Judge Boyd in the Circuit Court for Garrett county, has been dismissed, which puts an end to the case. The case involved the boundary line between the two counties and a vast area of land, also the question of the right of Garrett county to collect from the Consolidation Coal Company about $40,000 in taxes claimed to be be due this county in the disputed territory. In the year 1872, by an act of the Legislature Daniel Chisholm, then county surveyor of Allegany county, was directed to run a straight line from the Savage river at a point where the river empties into the Potomac river, using the Fairfax stone on the West Virginia side of the Potomac as an observation point to the Mason and Dixon line, the section north of said line to form what is now known as Garrett county. The line was located and the surveyor's returns with a plat accepted, and by vote of the people the new county was formed.

The line thus formed by Surveyor Chisholm and returned by him was considered by both Allegany and Garrett counties as the boundary line until Hiram P. Tasker made the averment that a number of military lots in both counties were not assessed. He was instrumental in having the Legislature of 1898 pass an act authorizing Surveyor L. A. Bauer to relocate the line. By the line run by Mr. Bauer a strip of land heretofore on the Allegany side of the line, which averaged about 2,000 feet for 18½ miles, and consisted of about 6½ miles of coal land was thrown on the Garrett county side of the line. When Garrett county attempted to collect the taxes on the land in dispute the Consolidation Coal Company, through Allegany county, which county was made a party to the injunction proceedings, secured an injunction to prevent Garrett county from collecting the $40,000 taxes. The claim was made that there was a vast difference between the lines run by Chisholm and Bauer, that the line run by Chisholm was only a trial line and that he intended to make and return another line.

Chief Judge Boyd, in his opinion stated that the case was filed by the Consolidation Coal Company, but the principal question argued was the poper location of the boundary lines between the two counties. He stated that while the Chisholm plat could not be found, there must have been one filed, as in his return Chisholm stated: "I have carefully run and located the lines of the aforesaid new county of Garrett, and herewith append a plat of the same according to their proper courses and distances." The point was raised that Chisholm did not run the line to the highest point on Savage mountain was crossed by the Mason and Dixon line, as directed by the act authorizing him to run the line. The court held that Chisholm ran the line to what he then, with the best means at his command (even the Mason and Dixon line being then in dispute), thought to be the top of the mountain on that line, and that the line so run by Chisholm was ratified by a vote of the poople of the new county, that all laws relating to Garrett county up to the time of the suit for taxes, were passed with that line in view as the boundary line, that all acts of the county were done with the same line in view, that it had stood undisputed from 1872 to 1898, and that the vote on the question of separating from Allegany county was taken and decided "according to the said Chisholm line.

Judge Boyd stated that the taking of the census, the returns of the election, etc., were all made with the Chisholm line as the boundary line. He also stated that it was known that County Surveyor Green of Garrett county had run the line later and that his line came out within two feet of where Chisholm had planted the stake at the end of his line. After reviewing the case at some length Judge Boyd, in his opinion, said: "My conclusions are, 1st, that Garrett county was formed under the provisions of the constitution and the act of 1872, according to the line run on the ground by Mr. Chisholm, which is described in his report and is located by the plaintiff."

"2nd. That if location of the boundary line be conceded to have been erroneous, as not being from the proper point on the Mason and Dixon line, the acquiescence in that line run by him was for such a length of time as to make it improper for the courts to now disturb it, as public policy forbids the change of a boundary line between two counties after it has been recognized and virtually accepted for twenty-five or more years, unless the change be made in the way provided for by the constitution.

"3rd. That as a consequence of these conclusions the plaintiff's property east of the Chisholm line was improperly assessed by Garrett county, and the injunction must be made perpetual, as the case was submitted for final hearing."

From this opinion the County Commissioners of Garrett county appealed and at the time of dismissing the case Clerk Tower had almost completed making up the record to be filed in the Court of Appeals. Many plats showing the location of the Chisholm line and also the new or Bauer line, had been prepared. By this action on the part of the Commissioners Judge Boyd's decision is final and henceforth the Chisholm line will be the undisputed boundary between the two counties.

The attorneys in the case were Messrs. Edward H. Sincell and Julius C. Renninger for the County Commissioners, and Messrs. Benj. A. Richmond, Albert A. Doub and Robert H. Gordon, of Cumberland, for the Consolidation Coal Company.

MR. ANNAN BANK PRESIDENT

Succeeds Late Ex-Governor Lloyd Lowndes.

CUMBERLAND, Jan. 15.—Daniel Annan, who for many years has been cashier of the Second National Bank, Cumberland, was today chosen president to succeed the late ex-Governor Lloyd Lowndes. The selection was a surprise to many, although because of Mr. Annan's ripe experience in banking it is considered a wise one. The position is said to pay $5000 per annum. Lloyd Lowndes, Jr., whom many thought would succeed his father, was chosen vice-president, an office that has not been filled since the death of the late Judge Coulehan. David F. Kuykendall, paying teller for about eight months, and previous to that time head bookkeeper, was elected cashier. Mr. Kuykendall has been with the bank 22 years. The directors elected today are James Clark, Oliver C. Gephart, L. M. Shepherd, Lloyd Lowndes, Jr., Robert R. Henderson, Michael Fesenmeier and Daniel Annan. The latter succeeds the late ex-Governor Lowndes, who was president for 32 years. Lloyd Lowndes, Jr., has been a director several months, having been appointed in the place of J. P. Roman.

TEACHERS' INSTITUTE PROGRAM.

The Sessions Will Be Held at Friendsville.

The following program for a teachers' institute to be held at Friendsville on Friday and Saturday of this week, has been furnished this paper by Mr. William Bishoff, of the committee on program:

Friday evening a literary program will be rendered by the scholars of the Friendsville school.

On Saturday morning the institute work will be taken up at 9.30 o'clock when an address of welcome will be delivered by Mr. R. E. Friend, followed by the response to be delivered by Superintendent E. A Browning.

Paper, "Reading and Language for Beginners," Miss Bessie Moore.

"Orthography," Prof. J. C. Beahm, principal of the Accident school.

"Penmanship," Mr. H. H. Flick, which will close the morning session.

The afternoon session, beginning at 1.15 will be opened by principal Ira Culp with the subject "Number Work,"

"Methods," Prof. E. A. Browning.

"Language," Mr. Wm. E. Bishoff.

Each subject will be followed by discussions.

In a note the committee adds: "All Garrett county teachers should be interested in institute work and we hope that these important subjects will receive through attention from those assigned to the work as well as from all others who are interested. We invite all to attend.

FARMERS' INSTITUTE WAS WELL ATTENDED

Three Interesting Sessions Held Monday and Tuesday.

AGRICULTURALISTS BENEFITTED

By Practical Talks of the Lecturers Present—The Query Box a Prime Favorite of those Attending.

The 1905 sessions of the Garrett County Framers' Institute which were held in the Court House in Oakland on Monday and Tuesday of this week, were largely attended by the agriculturalists of the county who evinced great interest in the proceedings both by their attendance and close attention to the lecturers who were brought here by the State Director, Prof. Amoss under whose direction the institute was held.

Mr. Amoss was accompanied by his wife and the two speakers, Mr. Edward Van Alstyne, of New York, where he is extensively engaged in fruit raising and also dairying, and Dr. H. P. Miller, editor of the Ohio North American Farmer, and a practical veterinarian.

The sessions opened on Monday afternoon at 1.30 o'clock by Dr. Miller, whose subject was "Some Facts for the Farmer and Teacher." His talk was one of interest and all who heard him who will put his words of instruction to a practical test will be materially benefitted thereby.

Dr. Miller was followed by Mr. Van Alstyne who devoted his remarks to the care of animals, touching upon the quantity and quality of food they require at all seasons of the year and under all circumstances. His talk was one of great practical value.

The query box at this session was not brought into very extensive use owing to the limited number present, the notice having been too short for those residing at a distance to avail themselves of the opportunity.

The Tuesday morning session was opened by Dr. Miller, whose subject was "Some Common Ailments of our Annimals and Their Treatment." The speaker interested his hearers by the forceful manner with which he handled this subject, dwelling at length upon the symptoms preceding the attacks and their remedies.

Mr. Van Alstyne followed with a practical talk upon the "Principles of Potato Growing." This subject was one of more direct interest to the farmers of Garrett county than any other discussed, the potato being the largest crop grown here.

In the afternoon session the subjects, "Crops that Improve the Soil," by Dr. Miller, and "Care of the Orchard," by Mr. Van Alstyne, were discussed and the many farmers present evinced great interest in what was being said.

The query box at the Tuesday sessions proved to be helpful in making questions of vital importance to the tillers of the soil plain and was used largely by them.

Prof. Amoss took part in a number of the discussions but was unable to be present at all the sessions owing to clerical duties connected with his position.

After the adjournment of the institute the speakers were taken out to the Weber gardens where they were entertained for an hour or more in looking over the extensive plant there. They expressed themselves as greatly surprised and highly gratified with the scope of the green houses.

Big Engine is O. K.

Baltimore and Ohio motive power officials are rather indignant at a report that the new Mallet compound locomotive, the largest in the world, had given out while in the service on the Connellsville division, where it is being used as a helper between Sand Patch and Rockwood. As a matter of fact the big locomotive is giving satisfaction, and is running every day and promises to be one of the most valuable purchases of the Baltimore and Ohio in the way of locomotives in recent years.

Evangelistic Services.

Rev. W. H. Faust, of Deer Park, requests the announcement to be made that a series of evangelistic services will begin at Elder Hill on Sunday next. The meeting will last two weeks or more. The subject for Sunday morning will be "Pentecostal Power." At the evening service 7.30, the subject will be "Walking With God." A cordial invitation is extended to all to attend these services.

B. & O. BRAKEMAN FROZEN TO DEATH

Fell From a Freight Train On Seventeen Mile Grade Sunday Night.

NEWTON F. SMITH THE VICTIM.

Found Sitting on Edge of Bank Three Hours After Fall—His Injuries were Many—Picked up by Train No. 1.

Netwon F. Smith, a Baltimore & Ohio brakeman, employed on the third division, fell from his train about 9 o'clock Sunday night near No. 40 water station, on the Seventeen-mile grade, about five miles east of Swanton, and received injuries so serious that he froze to death. Smith was in the middle of his train, attending to the brakes, while the train was descending the heavy grade, and in some manner slipped from the icy steel car, falling heavily to the ground, but out of reach of the deathdealing wheels. Fortune followed misfortune and the heavy fall to the hard frozen ground rendered the unfortunate brakeman almost unconscious and cut his body in several places. He managed to crawl from the tracks and when found was sitting on the bank.

Smith was not missed by his crew until the train reached Frankville, several miles east. The next west bound train No. 1, was instructed to look for the missing brakeman and three hours after he had fallen from the car, Smith was found frozen stiff. The body was in a sitting position on the bank near the tracks. The right elbow rested on the right knee and the right side of his face was grasped by the right hand. He had lost much blood from the several cuts on his body, which crippled him in such a manner that he was unable to walk and this, with the loss of blood, made him an easy victim for the severe weather.

The dead man was about twenty-five years of age and was a native of Terra Alta, W. Va., where his father runs a pumping engine. Mr. Smith boarded on Lafayette-ave, and was quite popular with the railroad men in South Cumberland. The remains were taken to the home of the deceased's parents in Terra Alta.

So far as we know our neighborhood is enjoying very good health at present, although we have had our share of afflictions, I suppose.

"Uncle Jerry" Enlow is with us no more. He was a good citizen and a good man, and because he was such we miss him the more. His family has our deepest sympathy in their bereavement.

We all lament the death of ex-Governor Lowndes. His efforts and influence for good government have been unexcelled in the state of Maryland.

Domingo, a Filipino youth is spending the winter here and is attending school. Anyone desiring to see a native of the Philippiues can do so by calling at the hospitable home of William Hoye.

Miss Dessie Friend, who is teaching at Friendsville, attended the quarterly meeting here and visited her parents also.

Gilbert Moon who is attending school at the University at Buckhannon, spent the vacation with his parents here.

We regret to learn of the illness of Mrs. J. E. Weigle, wife of our pastor, at Cranesville.

We are glad to have Miss Clara Bishoff with us often in our meetings. She is a big help to us in music.

Our musical talents are being developed under the leadership of Samuel Savage assisted by his brother Sherman.

Rev. Ward, P. E., of Oakland was with us Saturday and Sunday for the first time. He preached three excellent sermons for us.

The quarterly meeting was a decided success although not largely attended owing to the severity of the weather.

Rev. J. E. Weigle is succeeding quite well in his ministerial labors. He is earnest and fearless in the discharge of his duties.

"Uncle" Harrison Friend, who is past 80 years of age, is not too old to go to Sunday school. He is regular in attendance. What a noble example!

TELEPHONE RATES FIXED.

Capital Stock of the Garrett County Company Increased to $30,000.

The special meeting of the stockholders of the Garrett County Telephone Company called for last Saturday at Hoyes for the purpose of considering the advisability of increasing the capital stock to $30,000 and to fix the rates for the ensuing year, was well attended by those interested in the corporation.

The schedule of rates published in this paper some weeks ago was changed in a few particulars, the following being adopted:

Party lines, $4; private lines to families in town, $6; hotels, $6; liveries, $6; attorneys, $12; physicians on private lines, $12; physicians on party lines, $8, business offices not above specified, $10; merchants paying license on $1000 or less, $6; $1,000 to $2,000, $8; $2,000 to $4,000, $10; $4,000 to $6,000, $12. Rates not included in the above, $12.

Favorable action was also taken increasing the capital stock of the corporation to $30,000, none of which, however, will be sold at this time.

MARYLAND JURIST IN MISSOURI.

Former Garrettonian Elected the Second Time Chief Justice of Supreme Court.

Judge Theodore Brace, who has just been elected chief justice of the Supreme Court of Missouri, is a native of Garrett county, Md., and is a cousin of Dr. Charles H. Brace, of Cumberland. Judge Brace is one of the few supreme judges of Missouri who has had the honor of serving twice in that high office. Chief Judge Brace administered the oath of office to Governor Folk. He was first elected chief justice in 1895. In 1897 he was succeeded by Judge Gantt. Chief Justice Brace is the oldest member of the court in point of commission. The office of chief justice of the court of Missouri is created by the constitution, but it is chiefly an honorary distinction, no additional salary being attached to the office.

Justice Brace was born at Ryan's Glade, Garrett county, Md. When a youth he went with his parents to Cumberland to reside. His father, Charles Brace was a deputy sheriff for this county and had charge of the jail when Quantrell was there. Judge Brace went to the Allegany County Acadamy, having been a schoolmate of Mr. Robert Shriver, president of the First National bank, Cumberland. He was a clerk in the original Cumberland Savings bank and while thus employed he read law. He was admitted to the bar there in May, 1856, and soon after left for Missouri where he married and has since resided.

Mrs. Dr. R. B. Ward, who was called to Parkersburg about two weeks ago owing to the illness of Miss Teckla Johnson, who was there on a visit to her sister, returned to Oakland Tuesday evening. Miss Johnson is recovering rapidly and will return to Oakland some time next week.

TO BUILD CHURCH ON THE CORRIGAN LOT

Lutherans Instruct Official Board to Make Purchase.

THE GROUND WILL COST $3400

The Location Is An Ideal One for the Purpose—One Other Site Available No Bid Made for Ground Where Burned Edifice Stood.

A very well attended meeting of the membership of St. Mark's Evangelical Lutheran church was held Tuesday evening in the Presbyterian church which had been called by the official board of the church for the purpose of considering the purchasing of a new site for the erecting of the proposed edifice to take the place of the one burned on the 5th inst.

At a similar meeting held on Tuesday evening of last week a committee was appointed to investigate available, site viz.: Delawder lot adjoining the school house property, and the Corrigan lot at the corner of Third and Alder streets. After due consideration the official board was instructed to make purchase of the Corrigan property. The price of the lot is fixed at $3400 by the owners.

This property is located just opposite the lot where the original church stood and is an ideal location for a substantial building.

Plans will be submitted to the building committee which is to be appointed later and work upon the erection of a new house of worship will be commenced at an early date.

The committee appointed to make sale of the old lot reported at the Tuesday night meeting that no bid had been received for it and therefore it is still upon the market.

Resolutions.

Once upon a time there was a man and a woman, and they were husband and wife. On the first of the New Year the husband wrote down a dozen resolutions which he was determined to keep in the future. He was never going to smoke again, nor to drink, nor to swear, nor to lose his temper, nor to oversleep, nor to accuse the maid of taking things which he had carefully hidden himself, nor to play poker, nor to bet on the races, nor to read anything but the profoundest books, nor—but anyway his list was a mile long and when his wife saw it she looked disapproving.

"Better just make one resolution—and keep that," she suggested. But the man was determined that the regeneration was to be complete, and so he thought up more things, and added those.

Now his wife was a wise woman in her generation. She made one resolution, and she kept it. It was: "I resolve to be patient with my husband and to treat him exactly as he had human intelligence." She kept it, as has been said, and the man broke all of his the first month.

The First Miracle In Cana.

Arriving at Nazareth with his five lately called disciples, Jesus found an invitation awaiting him to attend the marriage to which his mother had already hastened on. A ten-mile extra walk across the wide and fertile plain brought the little company to Cana. As they entered the festive home of the bridegroom, six great flagons, beaded with moisture and their orifices crammed with fresh leaves, greeted them in the vestibule. The last water was drawn from these capacious jars to cleanse hands and feet of these late arrivals. The size, number, and material of those flagons was graven on John's memory by what afterward transpired.

The ablutions over, Jesus and His disciples entered the humble banquet-room. There the male guests were disposed according to their fancy on mats about the floor. Jesus' presence was no dash of sadness to that festal hour. The riddle guessing and story-telling incident to such occasions went right on. The Master came not to mar, but to adorn and beautify that marriage-feast. A moment later Jesus Himself was reclining: and, perhaps for the first time, the favored disciple in whom His human soul delighted was leaning in His bosom. The symposiarch continued to rule the feast. The happy bridegroom, adorned and anointed, surrounded by the "sons of the bride-chamber," was still the center of attraction.

From the festal-room, where the women congregated, and where the bride, covered from head to foot in her loose and flowing veil, garlanded with flowers and dressed in her fairest robes, was the observed of all—Mary came to whisper in her son's ear that the store of wine had failed, an event considered humiliating in an Oriental home.

Jesus' reply to His mother indicates that He understood her suggestion that He should use His Divine power to bridge this domestic chasm, which His coming with His disciples had helped to create. And it was altogether appropriate that, as other guests had done, He should add to the provisions for the banquet by a personal gift.

Even against maternal interference Jesus must guard His miracle-working prerogative. In this matter He has nothing in common with any mortal, not even His own mother. The times and seasons (indicated by the phrase "Mine hour") for the display of supernatural power were matters of agreement between Father and son. In these matters, it is presumption in the last degree for a mortal to interfere. Again, His mother must know her status toward Him. "The Son had now become the Lord even of the mother."

Divorced from tone and look, the words, especially in our version, seem harsh. They were not so; and even in them, Mary's quick woman's wit divined that, though Jesus did not work the miracle at her suggestion, He would still soon work it.

Not in the splendid temple, but in a humble home; not before the Sanhedrin of savants, but before a company of humble Galileans, Jesus manifested His glory in His first miracle, the special purpose of which was to confirm His disciples faith in Him.

Mosaic from Commentaries.

Cana of Galilee: Identified with insignificant village, five miles north of Nazareth—Kanet, New Century. A marriage: Among all Orientals marriages were occasions of much ceremony and unbounded feasting.—Tristram. Jesus was bidden: His presence suggests the honor of matrimony.—Pulpit Com. The earthen floor and the ledge round the wall would be spread with carpets, the walls hung with garlands; the spirits of all bright and cheerful as the decorated chamber, and the modest rejoicings in no way clouded by the presence of Mary's Son and His followers.—Geikie. Wanted wine: And they had not wine because the wine of the wedding was finished.—Old Manuscript, Tischendorf. Occasioned by arrival of Jesus and His disciples. None but those who know how sacred in the East is the duty of lavish hospitality, and how passionately the obligation to exercise it to the utmost is felt, can realize the gloom which this incident would have thrown over the occasion, or the misery and mortification with which it would have caused to the wedded pair.—Farrar. They have no wine: For half a lifetime she had known the resources of an absolutely unclouded judgment, a perfectly developed faculty, and an entirely unselfish heart. And it was inevitable that in every embarrassment she must have turned to him. . . . But more than this it is probable that she realized that the hour of His manifestation to the world was at last come: and the noblest and most unselfish woman could not fail to wish to direct the operation, so as to remove, unnoticed, the distress of her own friends.—Expositors. Woman: Nothing disrespectful—term used in addressing persons of highest rank.—New Century. Though in a gentle and affectionate manner, Jesus rejects her interference, intending to supply the demand in His own way. —Vincent. Mine hour is not yet come: By this "hour" or time we understand some divinely appointed crisis, or some transition-point in His history, opening some new stage, or initiating some new event.—Whedon. Those who believe that the wine spoken of in this lesson was unintoxicating, will teach in accordance with that belief. Those who believe that it was ordinary wine, will teach that the making of such wine by our Lord no more indorses intoxication than the creation of the poppy, from which laudanum is made, indorses suicide. —Schauffler. Six waterpots of stone: As an eyewitness, John remembers their number, size, and material.—Camb. Bible. This beginning of miracles: Public men are sometimes anxious with regard to a first appearance that it should be upon a scene in society and with accompaniments worthy of themselves or of their own conceptions of themselves. Jesus proved His superiority to human vanity and weakness in performing His first sign in a lowly home at a villager's wedding. His conduct in this way was just like Himself.—Pulpit Com.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Worthy of remark is it that Jesus produced a flagon of wine for each of His company—one for Himself and one for each of His five disciples. Over a hundred gallons of richest wine—a goodly dowry for the bride.

To magnify Jesus' making of wine on this occasion, however, is to make a mere accident the principle, and miss the mark entirely. The chief design of this record is to show our Savior's sanctification of marriage and home-life.

No argument for wine-drinking in our country, under present social conditions, can be constructed from this incident. In the Orient wine is a staple of food. Its use is a matter of dietetics. In its quality it is not as a rule, highly alcoholized. The making of wine in Cana does not justify the use of it in Chicago.

The conditions are changed here. We have an abundance and variety of food never dreamed of in an Oriental home. We do not need wine. The wine in common use is doctored and more highly alcoholized. The climatic conditions are different. They predispose to excess. Excess is the rule. Intemperance prevails.

Under these conditions, total abstinence is our duty to self and neighbor.

GEN. BAUGHMAN AND MANLY SPORTS.

Gen. Victor Baughman rises to defend the present election law and with a surprising display of "nerve" says that our present law is the product of the Reform League! The League evidently does not know its own off-spring. The General thinks it is "unmanly and unsportsmanlike" for the Republicans to charge fraud. It certainly would be reprehensible if they could not prove what they charge. Republicans and a good many other people not Republicans, feel that it was "unmanly and unsportsmanlike" to put our elections on a basis that gives unfair advantages to the Democrats. Trick ballots, deceitful folding, and the "top and bottom" scheme have none of the ear-marks of the manly sports. Who can imagine a game of foot-ball between Princeton and Yale being played and Princeton or Yale resorting to palpably unfair methods? The offending side would be mercilessly hooted off the play-grounds.

Lupton Frantz is Released.

Lupton Frantz, whose daring escapades have gained for him much notoriety all over Western Pennsylvania, has been released from the county jail at Uniontown after serving a little over three months of a nine month's sentence. Frantz was given his liberty on account of a special order granted by the court. He was sentenced to nine months to jail on the charge of assault and battery. His sentence began October 5. Frantz's behavior while within the confines of the jail was of the best and it was owing to this, in a large measure, that he was released after having served but little over one-third of the original sentence.

A SNAKE STORY WITH A MORAL

Horrible Adventures of Railroad Men on the "Teakettle" Line.

SLEW A MONSTER RATTLE SNAKE

The Reptile Had Been Eating Stuff Shipped By the Road—Startling Yarn Comes From the Confines of Staid Old Preston County.

A very strange snake story is going the rounds of the railroad men employed on the West Virginia Northern railroad that runs between Kingwood and Tunnelton, and strange as it may seem is vouched for by some very truthful eye-witnesses.

It appears from the way the story goes that the conductor, who is also baggagemaster, and acts in the capacity of engineer and fireman when he is not otherwise employed, had been missing a great deal of produce, such as eggs, butter, ham and side meat, as well of whole cases of canned goods, and no clue of the thief or thieves could be found regardless of the close watch that was daily kept for them. An employee or two of the company were under suspicion, and all the officials of the road were in consternation over the robbery and were powerless to do anything, but pay the bills that were handed them weekly, and some shrewd detective work was being done, but to no avail. However, the mystery was solved one day this week, shortly after the train had left Tunnelton for Kingwood, by Jacky Sterling, who had the train in charge that day. He had loaded some supplies for the Irona mines in one end of the car that serves as coach and baggage car combined and had carefully locked the door with an iron padlock and placed the key in his pocket and remarked that there would be nothing gone that day, and was busily engaged in collecting fares from two woebegone travelers, as well as telling of some of his remarkable experiences since his employment with the road, including a train robbery and other things, the most remarkable of which was a run that he engineered through from Tunnelton to Kingwood, a distance of ten miles, with the coach and one box car for a train, covering the entire distance in one hour and thirty-five minutes, and only off the track once, which is the fastest record time ever made in the "jerk water." Just in the middle of one of his most exciting stories a dreadful hissing, which sounded as if a steam pipe had been bursted, cracking of eggs and turning over boxes was heard in the other end of the car. Whereupon Sterling pulled the bell cord and had the train stopped and summoned his men and armed them with picks, coupling pins and hand axes and proceeded to carefully unlock the door, expecting to be met by one or more of the Davis gang of housebreakers that have since been captured, but instead a very large and dangerous rattlesnake was seen coiled up in the other end of the car, hissing and shaking its rattles vigorously and showing plenty of fight. After a very lengthy struggle the snake was dispatched and several of the party had narrow escape from being bitten, and was found to measure 19 feet 7 inches and was adorned with 36 rattles and a button.

After the excitement of battle had somewhat subsided and an examination of the car was being made as to where the reptile had entered the car, it was found that it had turned the egg crate directly over a hole in the floor of the car about 10 by 12 inches that had been cut there to make some steam pipe connections, but since abandoned, and led back under the main part of the car, which had a false bottom. The snake had eaten about one half of the crate and was preparing to go back to his hiding place, when it found that it was trapped and became enraged and was making the hissing noise that led to its discovery; otherwise had it remained in there until the car had reached Kingwood someone might have been bitten by the deadly snake.

It is supposed that the snake is one that escaped from a show that was wrecked on the road last summer near Howesville. It was brought to Kingwood by the trainmen and presented to H. H. Potter, who has it stuffed and can be seen any day by anyone doubting this story. Mr. Potter says that it is the finest specimen of the reptile tribe he has ever seen and prizes it very highly.

Every one connected with the road is breathing much easier at present and things are again running smoothly. The instructions from the general manager's office were that the story was not to be told, as it might injure the passenger traffic, but one of the trusties who had imbided too freely of Tunnelton firwater told the tale yesterday in a sott drinks emporium here, where he had gone to quench his thrist, and from there the story became public.

Moral—Don't drink firewater.

WILL OF LATE GOV. LOWNDES.

Filed in the Orphans' Court Friday Morning for Probate.

The last will and testament of the late Gov. Lloyd Lowndes was filed in the Orphans' Court at Cumberland Friday morning for probate. The document is in the handwriting of the deceased and was executed April 21, 1904. It reads as follows:

"In the name of God, amen. I Lloyd Lowndes, of the city of Cumberland, Maryland, do make this my last will and testament, in manner following, that is to say; after the payment of all my just debts and funeral expenses, I give, devise and bequeath as follows:

"First, I give, devise and bequeath to my wife, Elizabeth Tasker Lowndes, the sum of $250,000 in property, part of my estate to be by her selected, and for the purpose of making such selections, I hereby empower her to have an appraisment of all my property made, and as executrix hereunder, to convey to herself absolutely, the property she may select under this clause of my will.

"Second, I give and bequeath to my sons, William Bladen and Tasker Gantt Lowndes and the survivors of them the sum of $50,000 to hold in trust for my daughter, Elizabeth Lloyd Lowndes, in manner following; that is to say the said sum of money to invest and semi-annually pay her the income accruing upon said sum for and during her natural life, and no longer, and immediately from and after her death to pay the said sum of money to the issue of her body, living at the time of her death in equal shares, per stripes et non capital and in the event of the death of my daughter without issue living at the time of her death, then the said sum of money is to revert and become part and residue of my estate hereinafter disposed of.

"Third, I give and bequeath to the vestry of Emmanuel parish, of the Protestant Episcopal church in Allegany county, Maryland, the sum of $2,500, to be paid in one payment, or five equal payments extending for five years at the discretion of my executrix.

"Fourth, I give and bequeath my family servant, John F. Brown, the sum of $300.

"Fifth, all the rest and residue of my estate, of every kind of which I am now seized and possessed, or of which I may die seized and possessed, I give devise and bequeath to my children, Lloyd, Richard Tasker, Charles Thomas, William Bladen, Elizabeth Lloyd and Tasker Gantt Lowndes, share and share alike.

"Sixth, lastly, I do hereby constitute and appoint my wife, Elizabeth Tasker Lowndes, to be the executrix of this, my last will and testament, directing that she shall be relieved from all bond for the performance of the trust, hereby reposed in her.

"In witness whereof I have herewith set my hand and seal this twenty-first day of April, one thousand, nine hundred and four.

'LLOYD LOWNDES.' (Seal)."

DEVOE'S DIRE PROGNOSTICATIONS

Crops and Animals Due to Suffer if Professor's Predictions Are Fulfilled.

According to Professor Andrew J. Devoe, the weather prophet of Hackensack, N. J., 1905 will be an orange famine, a cotton panic, a bad day for the inauguration, a severely hot summer and a cyclonic storm which will sweep the Atlantic Coast from Maine to Florida.

Professor Devoe says.

"Let us all prepare for a blizzard to continue January 12, 13 and 15. Up to January 15 it will be severely cold. In February it will again become severely cold. On February 3 there will be a big snowstorm, but the severest storm of the month will occur between the 19th and 22nd.

"Orange planters in the Gulf States who are allowing the fruit to remain on the trees should pick them now, because a great storm and killing rost is about to sweep that section. All oranges not picked before January 5 will be destroyed. Cotton planters who are preparing to burn their surplus should store it because the crop this year will be slim. It will be burned by the sun.

"The important event in March will be the inauguration. The weather on March 3 and 4 will be cloudy and threatening, and heavy storm is due on the 5th.

"For the United States 1905 will be a peaceful year. But the Russian-Japanese War will have to terminate within the next six months, or the United States and Great Britian will interfere without bloodshed. Both sides will lose, but Russia will have to evacuate Manchuria.

"A great storm is coming in the middle of May. The summer will be one of the hottest on record; December will be one of the coldest months ever known. Cattle and crops will suffer terribly from the summer heat.

FOR THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Active Campaign For Disfranchisement Has Been Planned.

DEMOCRATS TO PLAY STRONG GAME

Precinct Clubs Will Be Organized Throughout State If Court Of Appeals Says Act is Valid.

A grim, determined fight to pass the proposed disfranchising amendment is promised by the Democratic managers, and all idea of an extra session of the Legislature to pass a compromise measure seems to have been abandoned. This plan is, of course, based on the assumption by the organization leaders that the amendment was legally passed, and that the Governor's withheld signature was not requisite to its validity.

Although the open campaign will not be begun until the decision of the court of last resort is handed down, preliminary steps for a complete organization of the State have already been made, and it is asserted that no effort will be made or spared to push the fight every minute until the votes are counted at the next November election. A so-called campaign of education will be carried on, and the provisions and claimed effect of the Poe amendment will be explained by speeches, documents and articles published in the newspapers. Already prominent speakers from the Southern States have been secured to tell how the negroes were disfranchised there, and how disfranchisement has worked in practice. Precinct campaign clubs and committees will be established throughout the State, and in short, every known device approved by politicians will be brought into play to induce voters to mark their ballots "For the amendment."

Senator Gorman, it is said, has determined upon this policy, and all his loyal followers are expected to fall into line. State Chairman Vandiver, who is ardently devoted to Mr. Gorman and who, it is said, only remains at the head of the committee to uphold the Senator's hands, has missed but few days from the Eutaw House headquarters since the election, and recently he has been assisted a good deal by Mr. Albert J. Almoney, who usually helps only during the active part of a campaign. Mr. Almoney keeps in touch with the county committees, and has superintendence of the rural registration work.

Mr. Lloyd Wilkinson, secretary of the State Central Committee, who was recently succeeded as Insurance Commissioner by Mr. Frank I. Duncan, is also usually but little in evidence around headquarters, except for a couple of months or so just preceding an election, but since he transferred his office to Mr. Duncan last Monday he has spent a large part of each day at the Eutaw House, and it is understood that he intends to devote the major part of his time this year to work for the amendment.

While Governor Warfield never committed himself one way or the other on the proposition for an extra session of the Legislature, it was noticeable that many of those who sided with him last winter strongly advocated such a course. The Gorman people, though, manifested but little disposition to compromise and, as it would have been folly for the Governor to call an extra session if the Poe amendment champions were simply going to "stand pat" and unless they would agree in advance to support a less objectionable measure, the agitation has gradually subsided.

Should the Court of Appeals decide against the validity of the amendment, the Gorman people say they will be able to point out that they did their best to redeem their promiees for negro disfranchisement, but failed through no fault of theirs. They claim that to drop it now would be worse for them than to carry the fight to the bitter end even, as they admit, at the iminent risk of defeat. Should the amendment go on the ballot, Maryland will this year experience the most exciting political campaign for many years—certainly since 1895.

Attorney General W. S. Bryan, Jr., today received printed copies of the record in the mandamus case of Mr. Murray Vandiver against Governor Warfield to compel the placing of the Poe constitutional amendment on the official ballot next fall. This case was on December 22 decided by the Circuit Court for Anne Arundel county in Mr. Vandiver's favor.

The case is No. 37 on the Court of Appeals, docket, and the hearing of cases at the January term has now proceeded up to No. 11, so it will apparently be some time before the mandamus proceedings can be reached.

THE TELEPHONE IS EMPLOYED.

To Facilitate the Operation of Trains On the Baltimore and Ohio.

The Baltimore and Ohio railroad has gained the distinction in its progressive policy of being the first steam railroad in the world to reduce the movement of trains by telephone to a systemized practice, clothed with the best safe guards, as has been the telegraph train handling system that has been in operation for many years. The use of the telephone in this connection, having been demonstrated to be effective, the management of the road has authorized its officials to avail themselves of this valuable auxiliary from time to time as experience proves it to be desirable, economical and in any way tend to safely hasten the movement of trains.

A conference of the dispatching forces was held recently, at Baltimore, and a set of rules and forms was arranged so to reduce the method of handling trains by telephone to a standarized system. Mr. Chas. Selden, Superintendent of Telegraph, was Chairman of the conference, and it is the exception that every non telegraph station that has a passing siding will be fitted up with a telephone connection to the nearest telegraph office. This will enable the transmission of the train orders from the telegraph office to the train crews at such sidings direct, or to an employe stationed there for that purpose.

For some time the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has been extending the use of the telephone for the transmission of ordinary business messages, connecting the division headquarters, with the terminals of the divisions by means of the "composite" telephone method. This system admits of the simultaneous working of the wires telephonically and telegraphically without interfering with each other. Such circuits have been established between Chicago and Garrett, Ind; between Garrett and Chicago Junction, Ohio, thus connecting up the Chicago division; between Newark and Chicago Junction; between Newark and Wheeling; between Wheeling and Fairmont; between Grafton and Wheeling; between Pittsburg and Wheeling and between Wheeling and Holloway, thus connecting the General Superintendent of this Grand division with the various superintendents and terminals with which he deals. Other circuits have been put in from Grafton to Clarksburg; Clarksburg to Parkersburg and from Grafton to Cumberland, thus completing the circuits for the division located at Grafton. There are also circuits between Balt[illegible] and Brunswick, Md., and Baltimore and Philadelphia for a like purpose.

In addition to these long circuits, the telephone is used extensively in single track blocking and for the movement of yard engines and the connection of non-telegraph stations with telegraph stations by which trains are moved from the former to the latter where the ordinary telegraph orders are received. In this manner the telephone is used for single track blocking between Newark and Bellaire, Ohio. The telegraph offices average about eight miles apart and at many points the siding extends beyond the telegraph office a distance of about two miles. By having the telephone located at the switches, a train is allowed to use the passing siding up to the outlet switch. Then as soon as the train for which it has been held has passed, the conductor notifies the operator in the block signal tower and he is given permission to proceed with his train to the next block signal office. In this the blocks are practically cut down so far as main track use is concerned, just so much as the side tracks extend into the blocks. In some instances, it permits of the use of four miles of passing tracks, leaving but four miles of main track to be covered by the blocking. The result is that it practically shortens the block by one half the distance and hastens the movement of traffic to that extent.

This method of using the telephone between Newark and Bellaire, over 104 miles of single track, has been in use for about two and a half years with great success. It is a system that very much facilitates the handling of traffic and is perfectly safe in the movement of trains.

The Baltimore and Ohio railroad will gradually extend the service to all points on its system where it will be beneficial. It is one of the various improvements being made by the Baltimore and Ohio, that result in thoroughly modernizing the operation of a large railroad system in the interest of the public and the company.

Notice of Dissolution.

Notice is hereby given that the firm of "W. H. Bartlett," carrying on the retail grocery business in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, and composed of William Harper Bartlett and F. T. Martin, has discontinued business. All persons indebted to said firm will make payment to F. T. Martin, who will pay all the debts against said firm.

The public is hereby notified not to trust or credit said firm, or said William Harper Bartlett on account of said firm, and they will not be responsible for further debts contracted by him or said firm.

CHOICE MISCELLANY

The New Army Chevron.

"Army men generally," remarked a veteran officer, "are pleased at the action of Secretary Taft in providing for the manufacture and issue of a new chevron. Under previous regulations each of the various kinds of coats required a different kind of chevron, the bars of which were of the high colored facing cloths, conforming to the various arms of the service.

"The colors used in dyeing this cloth are very fugitive. Experiments were made to obtain a chevron that would stand washing when attached to the white summer and cotton khaki coats, and finally the color of the olive drab shirting flannel was selected as the best. Bars made of cloth of this shade, sewed on a groundwork of olive drab serge, will harmonize with the service coats and at the same time are sufficiently distinctive. Bars of the same cloth sewed on a groundwork of either cotton khaki or white duck will harmonize with the khaki service and white summer coats.

"While the distinctive colors of the various arms of the service have been disregarded in the new chevrons, it will not lead to confusion, because the hat cords show the color of the arm of the service, and the ornaments on the coat collars show the organization to which an enlisted man belongs."—Washington Star.

His Dead Soldiers.

This grim story of the war is quoted from a Siberian paper: A Russian regiment was surprised by a Japanese ambuscade and lost 2,000 killed. Of one company every man was killed or wounded, only the captain and two other officers being able to get clear. After the battle the captain, though wounded, departed by himself. One of his friends, alarmed at this, went to look for him. He found him on the battlefield seated on a large stone.

He had dragged to the spot the bodies of the men who once formed his company and had arranged them in the ranks they filled when alive. When he recognized his friend, he called out to him to shoot him for his cowardice in being alive when all his men were dead. Then, losing his reason altogether, he harangued his dead men, calling upon them to follow him and promising them victory.

When they did not follow him, he reproached them, but affectionately, addressing them by their names. He had at last to be removed by force and is now in the lunatic asylum at Harbin.

Women Physicians For Lunatics.

One of the most famous of German physicians for the treatment of mental diseases, Professor Ludwig, is earnestly advocating the employment of women physicians in lunatic asylums. After years of investigation he has come to the conclusion that the insane are peculiarly susceptible to a woman's presence and influence, not only the women, but the men as well. He says he has been instrumental in obtaining the admission of one woman physician to an asylum for women in south Germany, and the results are simply phenomenal. The women are more tractable, and in the cases where mental disease is the result of sexual trouble the woman doctor works wonders. Ludwig is certain that in a short time no men physicians will be employed in female lunatic asylums. His opinion is supported in large measure by another eminent authority, Dr. Krapelin.

Cheaper Furs.

One of the results of the Russian-Japanese war is that raw furs are cheaper this season. It will take some time for the drop in the price of raw furs to affect the retail sale of the manufactured product, but the public are already beginning to get the benefit in reductions made in anticipation.

Russia is one of the largest fur buying countries. Canada and British North America send abroad their surplus of raw furs beyond what the American market will take. The United States, except for some production in Alaska, imports almost all of the expensive furs which are used here. Smaller furs, like muskrats, raccoons, skunks and opossums, are produced in large numbers in the United States, and a great part of them is exported.

China and Russia.

The bureau of statistics provides in recent issues of the consular reports tables showing the trade for many years of the United States with China and with Russia. The former was by far the greater every year of the past twenty.

We sold last year $12,862,000 worth of goods to China and bought from her $29,342,000 worth. The year before we sold $18,000,000 and in 1902 $24,000,000 worth.

Russia bought of us last year $19,944,000 and sold us $10,712,000. War preparations accounted for much the largest purchases on record. In six years we have sold much more to China.

Tea explains why our Chinese imports are so heavy.

Germany's Acquired Territory.

It is twenty years, says the London Post, since Germany began to build up a colonial empire, and the net result is that after spending some fifteen or twenty millions sterling she has acquired more than a million square miles of territory, with a sparsely scattered German population of between five and six thousand souls—men, women and children. Of the adult male population a third are officials or soldiers. Militarism is rampant everywhere, with the result that the white settler avoids German colonies as he would a plague.

WOMAN AND FASHION

Simple Shirt Waist.

Simple blouses or shirt waists fill a need and are always in demand, however much more elaborate ones may be liked. This one is laid in box plaits for its entire length and is becoming to the generality of women kind, while it is absolutely simple and well suited to wear with the jacket suit. The sleeves are among the latest of the season—wide and full at the shoulders and narrow at the wrists, where they are finished with deep cuffs. As illustrated the material is royal blue taffeta, with figures of the same color, but all the season's waistings are correct.

The quantity of material required for the medium size is three and three-quarters yards twenty-one inches wide, three and three-eighths yards twenty-seven inches wide or two yards forty-four inches wide.

Swiss Eider Garments.

Swiss eider is the material at the head of the list for comfort garments purposely designed for lounging during the cold season. They are made up with a dainty binding of stitched silk, and about the waist is loosely tied a silk cord, with tassel ends, which matches the binding in color. The Swiss eider can now be bought not only in the loveliest of plain colors, but in many attractive fancy designs, showing stripes and dots of a contrasting color; also a mottle effect, which is new.

Children Wear Cashmeres.

Cashmeres, so enthusiastically accepted by their elders, are being generously used for the little folks. Those, while soft and graceful and rich in coloring, lack some of the serviceable qualities of the flannels. Then there are "wool delaines" quaintly flowered and a new, very smooth and hard twisted serge and the albatross and the mohair and very light weight worsteds.

Panama Voile.

There is a new weave of veiling, quite heavy, called Panama voile, that is used for street and semidress gowns. It is shown in both plain and embroidered effects and in the most fashionable colors.

Smart Suit For Girls.

Mannish mixtures in tweeds and cheviots make smart suits for young girls in their teens. An attractive outdoor costume is shown here developed in brown and tan cheviot with leather trimmings. The use of leather on walking suits is very fashionable this season. The closing is made with leather covered buttons. The skirt is shaped with narrow gores and box plaits. Costumes in this mode may be made of velveteen, corduroy, ladies' cloth, zibeline or melton, with chamois, velvet or heavy silk for trimming. Some suits made of smooth faced cloth are trimmed with fancy braid. To make the skirt in the medium size will require three yards of material forty-four inches wide, with one-half yard of contrasting material for trimming. To make the skirt in medium size will require five yards of material forty-four inches wide.

How the Negro Will Be Judged

By BOOKER T. WASHINGTON

WE negroes must demonstrate more and more to the world that we are not only successful in religious organizations, but also IN BUSINESS AND COMMERCIAL ENTERPRISES. We will be judged in the future not so much by our ability to make abstract arguments and attract attention with our oratory, but by our efforts in CONSTRUCTIVE AND PROGRESSIVE directions. In the growth of a race complaints, condemnations and demands all have their elements of strength and helpfulness, but any race makes a mistake which depends wholly upon these for success.

The first and most fundamental thing is to give more attention as a race to the public schools in the south. The average negro child in the south is in school less than five months annually. In one state in the south less than one-fourth of the negro children attended any school at all year before last, and THAT ONE-FOURTH WERE IN SCHOOL FOR A PERIOD OF ONLY FOUR MONTHS. The schoolhouses in which many of our children are taught are not worthy of the name.

The negro race will never have again in this country such opportunities of securing land as it has today. The price of land in every part of the country is GRADUALLY INCREASING. If, in the southern states especially, we do not become landowners in this generation, it will be more burdensome for the next generation to do so. The time is not far off when the tide of foreign immigration will turn rapidly to the south, and WE SHALL BE DRIVEN TO THE RAGGED EDGE, so far as ownership of land is concerned, if we do not profit by our present opportunities.

We should strive to become in larger proportion a commercial and business race. We should organize and operate more banks, more stores, own more farms, and construct and own more and better houses. A race is judged largely by the character of the houses it occupies. The negro should not only wear shoes, BUT MAKE AND SELL SHOES. The negro woman should not only wear attractive hats, but make and sell hats.

IN EVERY CENTER OF NEGRO POPULATION THERE SHOULD BE A BUSINESS LEAGUE TO ENCOURAGE AND LEAD OUR PEOPLE IN COMMERCIAL AND BUSINESS DIRECTIONS.

While there is much discussion about the difficulties in the south, it is true that the fields of commerce, business, industry and labor are open to us there as they are not perhaps IN ANY OTHER PART OF THE COUNTRY. In proportion as we lay the foundations in these necessary directions we shall find our moral and church life strengthened and opportunities for negroes to secure college and university training enhanced.

NO RACE CAN SUCCEED WHICH IS ASHAMED OF ITSELF. I HAVE NEVER BEEN PROUDER OF BELONGING TO THE BLACK RACE THAN I AM TODAY. I AM PROUD OF OUR PAST, PROUD OF OUR PRESENT AND HAVE UNBOUNDED FAITH IN OUR FUTURE.

The Tendency of Americans to Overwork

By THOMAS M. TAYLOR, Eminent New York Physician

IT is an unfortunate fact that the lives of public and professional men cannot be regulated to avert what might be termed a national calamity. The lawyer, the doctor, the public man, CANNOT HAVE ANY REGULAR HOURS OF EMPLOYMENT. The banker might have, but there are always the after hour conference, the night meetings of directors and the worry that is constantly with him WHETHER HE IS ACTUALLY WORKING OR NOT.

It might be suggested to these men that they take frequent vacations, have regular exercise, sleep regularly, eat regularly and moderately, and NEVER, no matter what the conditions, OVERTAX THEMSELVES. But how many of them will follow such directions?

There are few examples that illustrate the value of such safeguards. There is Mr. Sage. He has always regulated his life in such a manner that at the age of eighty-eight he is still able to go about his work as usual and even scorns a vacation.

J. Pierpont Morgan also has the proper idea. He takes regular vacations and never permits his affairs, however pressing, to interfere with his health.

Perhaps the great trouble is that our public and professional men work hard INTERMITTENTLY. Long periods of comparatively easy routine are followed by several days of the most enervating mental activity.

IT IS THAT WHICH TELLS ON THE SYSTEM. IT IS BAD, BUT THERE DOESN'T SEEM TO BE ANY REMEDY FOR IT.

The Naval Supremacy Of the United States

By Captain THOMAS ALLNUTT BRASSEY, Former Editor of the British Naval Annual

WITHIN TEN YEARS THE COMMAND OF THE SEAS HAS PASSED FROM GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. THE LATTER COUNTRY IS NOW BUILDING MORE BATTLESHIPS THAN ENGLAND IS, AND ITS RESOURCES ARE GREATER THAN THOSE OF GREAT BRITAIN. Our only hope of maintaining our supremacy on the seas is a federation through which the colonies will aid in the building up and maintenance of the navy of the mother country.

PROSPERITY.

The farmers' products represent the most substantial increase in the real wealth of the country. They are not watered like stocks, nor boomed like prices of real estate, but represent labor well paid and evenly distributed and never on a strike. When the farmer has good crops and large stock increase it means not only prosperity for the basal and largest part of our people, but for every other class and every other enterprise. The greatest gain and cattle shipping city in the world furnishes a good barometer indicating the speedy rise or fall of all business, as well as the farmer. Chicago is that city and Chicago is experiencing a deluge of grain that eclipses anything within the memory of the oldest members of the Board of Trade. Between six and nine million bushels of the golden product from the west vainly awaits transportation eastward today. Every scrap of railroad equipment is in use and it is useless to seek more. Monday morning 5,000 car-loads of grain were offered for transportation and refused. One main eastward trunk line has orders calling for 1,000 more cars than they possess.

When the congested condition of railway traffic is caused, not by inefficient management but by enormous increase in coal, coke, grain, cattle and general merchandise, so that the whole equipment of cars and motive power is insufficient to supply the legitimate business, it means prosperity for the railroads and clearly indicates a great revival in all departments of business. The year is to be a record breaker in the prosperity and general business of the country.

WHY THEY DO NOT MARRY.

There is no girl in the world so handicapped in the race of matrimony as the middle class American girl. It is all very well to prate of liberty and co-education and all that sort of thing; but the American girl who does not have to work for her living and who is yet not wealthy enough to be invited to balls and parties and taken to Europe has about as much liberty and about as much chance of acquiring a good substantial husband as a bird in a gilded cage.

Wealthy American girls are introduced to men socially. They go about, here and there, with chaperons and maids and meet the American man at home and the foreign man abroad. They may buy themselves dukes if the whim seizes them. If they are not popular it is because they were not born to be so, not for lack of opportunity.

On the other hand, the woman who goes into business, the girl in the shops, the typewriter girl, the very maid in the kitchen, is thrown among men daily, and if she does not find a good husband it is because she never was meant by Providence to get one.

But, alas for the middle class girl! Outside of a few pink teas, where men wouldn't go if they were invited, she has no particular social life. During her boarding school days she makes eyes at a few callow youths, and if she has a brother she may by chance induce him to bring home a few chums or two for the holidays. But she is thrown with men neither in business nor socially. She feels that she is a bit too proud or too comfortable at home to go to work, and yet she is not rich enough to travel or to entertain.

It is only by accident that she ever meets an eligible man. Slowly but surely she sinks into old-maidenhood, wondering vainly why Prince Charming never appeared; or else she grows tired of the monotony and breaks out into a profession or goes in for church work, where she meets and marries the minister.

Do you know why so many girls who do not have to work are filling the downtown offices? They are doing it to kill the ennui that blights the life of the middle-class girl.—New York Tribune.

FOREST RESERVES.

To those who recall what may be called the period of agitation for the preservation of the forest it must be gratifying to learn of the gathering of no fewer than eight hundred delegates in the American Forestry Congress, and to have brought home to them some account of what has already been done in the direction pointed out by the pioneers. The forest reserves of the United States now number sixty-one and they embrace a total area of 63,348,656 acres, an increase of 525,162 acres since June 30, 1905. Reference has already been made to the more immediatly desirable legislation in the interest of forest preservation, such as the repeal of the timber and stone act, which was urged by the board of directors of the congress in their annual report and by many of the speakers before the congress. One very much desired object of the leaders of the movement is the concentration of effort on the part of those aiming to save the forests as a great national asset. The House of Representatiyes has done something to aid in this direction by passing a bill transferring the management of the forests from the General Land Office to the Bureau of Forestry, in which it is proposed to consolidate all the forest work of the federal government. It is also regarded as desirable that state associations devoted to forestry work should be consolidated with the national association, and there are hopes something in this nature being accomplished, or at least initiatad at the present meeting. The strong interest of President Roosevelt in the movement was evidenced by a characteristic address made by him before the congress on last Thursday afternoon.

Bank Statements.

The statements of the First National and Garrett National Banks of Oakland, and the First National of Friendsville, will be found elsewhere in these columns today. The exposition made by these three banking institutions reflect largely the volume of business of the communities where they are located, and should be highly gratifying to the public as well as the officials of the banks.

The First National of Oakland has deposits approximating $200,000 with a surplus fund of $25,000.

The deposits of the Garrett National amount to $254,000 with a surplus and undivided profits of nearly $20,000.

The Friendsville bank, a rapidly growing institution in a naturally wealthy community, has on deposit over $105,000 with a surplus approaching $10,000.

The "Book of the Royal Blue" for 1905

The January number "Book of the Royal Blue" starts the New Year with a most interesting collection of sketches and poems by several of the best known writers in the United States.

The illustrated poem, "Goin' Home," by Mr. Gillilan, of Baltimore, gives a delightful impression to the reader, which is kept up to the end.

Mr. Taber, of New York, contributes more "Ballads to Bad Babies," and a most delightful "Song of the Cat Bird," which is published by his special permission, and which is to form part of an operetta under preparation.

Edmund Vance Cooke, of Cleveland, the popular humorist-lecturer, contributes a breezy little sketch entitled "Adam."

Mr. Daly, of Philadelphia, furnishes a story entitled "Drafted."

Mr. Robbins, of Newark, N. J., has "A Page of Robbins."

Mr. Lewis, of Norfolk, continues "Stub Ends of Thoughts," which now are universally known and copied.

The interesting description of the Relief Department of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad in this number should be read by every railroad man. It presents some features of railroading that are not generally known.

A new department has been established in the January number which will increase the readers' interest from time to time. The newest and best things from the pen of the American Press Humorists will appear each month under the heading "Humor and the Humorists."

The "Book of the Royal Blue" is a real magazine, and differs only from others in that its advertising pages are used exclusively by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. The quality of its reading matter in many cases are better than the average.

The greatest care is exercised in selecting articles for publication, which account for its increasing popularity in the eight years of its existence.

The subscription price is but 50 cents a year; single copies 5 cents. Address D. B. Martin, Manager Passenger Traffic, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Baltimore.

"SAVED MY LIFE"

—That's what a prominent druggist said of Scott's Emulsion a short time ago. As a rule we don't use or refer to testimonials in addressing the public, but the above remark and similar expressions are made so often in connection with Scott's Emulsion that they are worthy of occasional note. From infancy to old age Scott's Emulsion offers a reliable means of remedying improper and weak development, restoring lost flesh and vitality, and repairing waste. The action of Scott's Emulsion is no more of a secret than the composition of the Emulsion itself. What it does it does through nourishment—the kind of nourishment that cannot be obtained in ordinary food. No system is too weak or delicate to retain Scott's Emulsion and gather good from it.

We should have a queer condition ofc ivil-society if sentiment were law—especially that maudlin sentiment that swings back and forward like a pendulum and that usually makes itself most conspicuous in times of murder trials when criminals are made to feel that they are not heroes but they are at least victims of persecution. Law knows no sentiment, and it is well for the safety of society that it does not.

Messrs. Alfred and Benj. F. Friend, of near Frieadsville, were callers at this office Monday evening.

The roller skating craze which flourished a decade or so ago has revived and hundreds of rinks have been opened in the cities of the country. For a time people lost interest in the sport, but it has regained much of its lost ground.

We are pleased to announce that Mr. L. L. Loar, who has been quite ill for several days past, is greatly improved today. Mr. Loar was taken sick one day last week upon his return from Clarksburg, and for a day or two his condition was quite critical.—Grafton Sentinel.

Mr. Wade D. Ferguson, of Georgia, representing the Bureau of the Census, Washington, is in Oakland gathering statistics for the census of 1905. He represents the manufactures department of the bureau and will endeavor to get an accurate report from every one employing labor in the production of material of all descriptions.

Mr. Henry Lauer, the baker, has put on the market within the past few days a variety of home-made candy. The ingredients are pure and wholesome—the best that can be secured. He has found a ready market for the product and as soon as he can increase his facilities he will begin the manufacture of the candy upon a larger scale.

"Profitable Advertising" calls attention to what it claims to be in the position to know is a fact, that Pittsburg banks do more advertising than the banks of any other city in the country; and Pittsburgers well acquainted with the banks of the city say it is undoubtedly true that the advertising banks are the ones which have most rapidly increased their business in recent years.

The Inman Mining company have remove their main office from Philadelphia to Cumberland, and are now located in the Walsh buil ding, in the office with Messrs Lowndes & Seaver. There have been several changes in the roster of officers. A. B. Shaw, of Moscow, has been elected president, vice E. D. Chaffee, Philadelphia, and Peter J. Seaver, of Cumberland secretary, vice Edwin S. Ward, Philadelphia, Mr. Ross Compton, of Grantsville, succeeds Mr. A. B. Shaw in the vice presidency, and W. W. Seaver is treasurer and general manager.

CHURCH LOT SOLD.

Purchased Last Night by Mr. Henry Lauer.

Last night Mr. Henry Lauer, proprietor of the Oakland Steam Bakery, purchased from the official board of the Lutheran church the lot which until the recent fire was covered by the church edifice, for the sum of $3000. Mr. Lauer will improve the property at one by the erection of a modern brick building suitable for his purposes.

Is Advanced to Superintendency.

Mr. John A. Droege, son of Mr. and Mrs. Emil F. Droege, of Deer Park, was recently appointed superintendent of the Worcester division of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad. Mr. Droege was born in Deer Park in the year 1861. In 1880 he began as a telagrapher on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. He later held positions on the Chesapeake and Ohio, Norfolk & Western, Lehigh Valley and Pennsylvania.

His promotion to this responsible position is a source of gratification to his many friends in Garrett county and elsewhere.

Bad Shooting Scrape.

J. J. Dilworth and son Martin, former residents of Garrett county, living near Gorman, now residing near Rowlesburg, W. Va., got into an altercation with a man named Lipscomb near Rowlesburg, on Sunday of last week and the elder Dilworth brought his Winchester rifle into play and fired four shots at Lipscomb neither of which took effect. The son then attacked Lipscomb with a rock and made him insensible and seriously injured him. They were arrested and are being held pending the outcome of Lipscomb's injuries.

DEATH OF JOHN GLOVER.

A Former Resident of Garrett County Passes Away at a Ripe Age.

John Glover, who has resided in this immediate community since the building of the railroad in 1872, and for quite a number of years in this borough, died at his home on North street, after a protracted illness of comsumption, Sunday, January 8, 1905, aged about 72 years.

Deceased was born in the year 1833 is Preston county, West Virginia, in which county he was also partly raised. Before locating in this county he resided for a number of years in what is now Garrett county, Maryland.

In the year 1854 he was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Sisler, who survives, and to this union were born ten children, but three of whom survive—Mrs. Tabler, of Cumberland, Mrs. Calvin Folk and Mrs. Charles Wilhelm, both of this city. A daughter, Mrs. Wm. Griffith, of this city, died about two years ago.

Mr. Glover served faithfully and gallantly during the civil war as a member of Company D Third Maryland Volunteers, and at the time of his death was a member of M. C. Lowry Post 214, Grand Army of the Republic. About twenty of his comrades attended the funeral in a body, and a detachment of J. D. M. Armbrust Camp No. 57, Sons of Veterans, served as pall-bearers. Funeral services, in charge of Eld. E. F. Clark, of the South Side Brethern church, were conducted at the late residence of the deceased on Tuesday afternoon. Interment was made in the Union cemetery, where the last sad rites were performed by the members of Lowry Post. Peace to his ashes.—Meyersdale Republican.

85TH BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION

Mrs. Elizabeth Grannan, of Bloomington, Surrounded by Descendants.

Mrs. Elizabeth Grannan, a venerable woman, formerly of Cumberland, but now making her home with her daughter, Mrs. Andrew Mullen, in Bloomington, Garrett county, celebrated the 85th anniversary of her birthday on Friday. The event was an occasion for a happy gathering of children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren and neighbors and other friends of this good old lady, who is still enjoying good health and cheerfulness despite her five and eighty years. Mrs. Grannan was a native of Baltimore city but she spent a great portion of her life in Cumberland, where she raised a large family and is well known. After the death of her husband she lived with her sons in Baltimore for awhile, but about 20 years ago went to Bloomington to make her home with her daughter. Mrs. Grannan has the following children living: Mrs. Peter Yarnall and Mrs. D. E. O'Neill, of Cumberland; Police Justice Eugene Grannan, of Baltimore; Mrs. Andrew Mullan, of Bloomington; Mrs. Katie Philips, of Piedment, and Mrs. Maggie Meade. She also counts among her descendants 27 grandchildren and 15 great-grandchildren. All of her children except Justice Grannan and Mrs. Meade, with many of the grandchildren and great-grandchildren were at the celebration Friday. A bountiful dinner was served and after the feasting a merry afternoon was passed with the old lady as the central figure of interest. Many congratulations were showered upon her.

"CHEAP JOHN" MICHAELS

Will Return to Oakland About April First.

"Cheap John" Michaels, who for some years has been flitting with the martins and other migratory birds, will return to Oakland on or about April 1st and resume business in the room in the opera house block which he occupied prior to his removal last fall to York, Pa., where he will put in a line of summer goods, fancy groceries, fishing tackle, etc.

In a letter to the editor received Tuesday evening he says: "I will be there about April 1st. I propose to settle down and stay in Oakland. This is my last move. I am sorry to learn of the great loss by the recent fire."

George Mason says the prodigal will be welcomed but before he is allowed to unpack his goods he will be compelled to execute a bond to remain in Oakland for at least a year.

Lutheran Services.

Lutheran services will be held in the Presbyterian church next Sabbath as follows: Sabbath school at 9.30 a. m.; preaching at 7.30 p. m.

"The Old Maids' Convention."

Some of the ladies of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, with the assistance of several ladies of other denominations, will give an entertainment in the way of a staged play entitled "The Old Maids' Convention," at some near future day. The proceeds of the play will be devoted to the benefit of the Lutheran church and will go into the fund for the rebuilding of the church which was recently destroyed by fire.

Jimmie Torrington's Insanity

By COLIN S. COLLINS

Copyright, 1904, By T. C. McClure

When Jimmie Torrington proposed amateur theatricals as a means of lifting the debt from the Kingston Golf club and possibly supplying a foundation for a building fund the golf club crowd decided that he must be crazy.

This belief was strengthened when Torrington placidly consented to act as property man and made no effort to prevent Herbert Ranson's becoming stage manager. It was well known that Kittie Clausen favored these two of her numerous train of admirers, and Carson voiced the general sentiment when he said:

"Jimmie is insane to permit Ranson to be the stage manager. Of course Ranson will cast himself for the hero and make Kittie the heroine, and Jimmie will be out in the cold."

If Torrington realized his error he gave no sign. On the contrary, he amiably insisted upon taking a greater part of the work upon his own shoulders. It was he who hired such costumes as were needed, secured the scenery and even induced a theatrical friend to promise to make up the players on the night of the performance.

Torrington was the type of man who most enjoyed doing things for others. He was not a handsome chap in spite of his bright eyes and clear complexion. He was rather short of stature (dumpy, Ranson called him), and his favor with Kittie Clausen had been gained by his qualities of mind and disposition. Ranson, on the other hand, was as striking in appearance as the hero of a cheap novel. He made an ideal hero for the play, and even at rehearsals he put a deal of feeling into the love scenes with Kittie.

Apparently Torrington was the only one who did not notice the fervor thrown into the rehearsal, and when it was brought to his attention he merely smiled complacently and remarked that he hoped the speaker might be able to play his part as well on the fateful night.

Gradually this indifference was accepted as a silent admission that Torrington had withdrawn from the contest in favor of his more attractive rival, and when he was not around the men began to speak of "poor" Torrington, while the women marveled at the completeness and suddenness of his surrender.

"DON'T YOU DARE TO SPEAK TO ME LIKE THAT!" SHE PANTED.

But Torrington was not worried. If he was aware of the compassion of the men and the scorn of the women he did not show it, and his moonlike face was always lighted by a peaceful smile as he sat by the prompter's table at rehearsals and watched the proceedings. He acted as useful man about the stage, reading the part of some one unable to attend rehearsal, holding the book as prompter or performing any slight service asked him.

Ranson, who possessed considerable ability as an actor, worked hard with his cast of amateurs, but it is not easy to teach the art of acting, and when in the course of time the repetition of mistakes drove him frantic he gradually lost command over his temper and at the dress rehearsal he had to apologize to the entire company, including Kittie, at various times throughout the evening.

The others absolved him, but that evening Torrington walked home with Kittie, to the great surprise of all. Their astonishment would have been greater had they known that the invitation came from Miss Clausen herself.

But if Miss Clausen had transferred her favors to Jimmie in the hope of finding him a ready sympathizer she was in error. Torrington was sorry that her feelings had been hurt, but he was not prepared to admit that Ranson was to blame. Oddly enough, his defense of Ranson served to increase her sense of injury. When the night of the performance arrived she was scarcely civil to the stage manager and flounced into her dressing room with so curt a "good evening" that even Torrington gasped.

Ranson looked surprised, but there was no time then for explanations, and he went off to the dressing room where the professional actor had installed himself.

The shelf in front of the mirror was covered with sticks of paint of all colors, boxes of powder and the various implements of makeup art, all redolent of the cheap perfume added to conceal the rancidity of the grease used as a foundation.

Ranson, to whom the process of making up was not new, submitted to the heavy applications of paint and powder and hurried back to the stage to superintend the final preparations.

Presently Kittie emerged from her dressing room, and he went toward her. She shrank from him. While she knew that makeup was required, she was not accustomed to seeing men with paint on their faces, and there was something oddly repulsive in the appearance of this man with his heavily lined eyebrows, rouged cheeks and whitened temples. It seemed like a ghastly mask of the man she knew, like the badly painted portrait of an acquaintance.

She could scarcely listen to his expressions of penitence at the loss of his temper the night before and hailed with positive relief her own call to the makeup room.

The darkening of her eyebrows and lashes, the reddening of lips and cheeks and a dash of powder were all that she required, and she escaped from the chair, glad that no more was needed.

During the first act the excitement of playing was too great to permit her to turn her attention to other thoughts. She could not permit her mind to be diverted for an instant from her next speech, the next move across the stage.

With the second act came greater confidence. It was here that the love scenes commenced, but they did not seem the same as at rehearsal. She could not endure the touch of this man, with his paint covered features, and the penetrating odor of bergamot, heavy almost to nausea, sickened her nostrils. The scene was like a nightmare. Even worse was the last act, with its powerful closing scene. The touch of his greasy lips upon her cheek, the unnatural look of the eyes made brilliant by the dark circles of crayon, startled her, and before the curtain rang down she felt that she should scream.

Leaving the stage after the last tableau, Ranson caught her hand.

"Can't you forgive last night, Kitty, and make the 'yes' you have just spoken your answer to the question I have wanted to ask for so long?"

She tore her hand from his grasp.

"Don't you dare to speak to me like that," she panted. "If you do not let me go, I shall call Mr. Torrington."

Ranson threw a black look at Torrington, who was placidly gathering up small stage furnishings, dropped her hand and turned away. Kittie turned back to the stage, and Jimmie's honest, unpainted face never seemed so cherubic.

"Jimmie," she asked softly, "do you want to take me home again tonight?"

"Do I?" repeated Torrington. "I'd like to take you to a home of our own, Kittie."

She smiled demurely. "I think you may," she said.

That night Jimmie Torrington addressed his shaggy terrier. "Wriggles," he said solemnly, "when you find in your canine walk of life a lady dog you love be wise. If she looks with favor on a sleeker coated puppy you just get that puppy to run a dog show. It's a sure cure."

And Wriggles blinked an approving eye.

The Man Who Tired Carlyle.

There is a story of Carlyle in his old age having taken the following farewell in his broadest Scotch of a young friend who had had him in charge for walks and who, while almost always adapting himself to Carlyle's mood, had on a single occasion ventured to disagree with him: "I would have you to know, young man, that you have the capacity of being the greatest bore in Christendom." The boredom had consisted solely in the rather negative sin of not having been convinced of the truth of one of Carlyle's dogmas, a sin all the more heinous because, instead of standing boldly up to Carlyle and declaring his doctrine utterly perverse, the companion had betrayed his weakness by an apologetic tone.

Now, Carlyle liked disciples, and he respected antagonists, but he could not endure being merely thwarted without being thoroughly roused. He felt in that case that he had made no impression at all on his interlocutor; that he had neither won him nor excited him to resistance. And nothing bored him so much as that. Of course it is only exceptionally despotic minds that are bored in this way.—London Spectator.

Dodging the Dangers of Heredity.

Mrs. Simpson has a profound belief in the doctrine of heredity as she understood it. Mrs. Simpson is colored. She washes for a living. A few years ago her husband passed away, not by death or divorce, but by the simple process of abandonment. He left her to support a little daughter, who is a bright child.

"What is your little girl's name?" asked one of Mrs. Simpson's patrons the other day.

"Helen," replied Susan.

"Oh, indeed! Named after some of your relatives?"

"Waal, no. I kinder liked the name mahself. But dat ain't what I called her fust."

"No?"

"No. Fust she was chris'ened Anna Cornelia after a pusson what was a partic'lar friend ob mine at dat time, but me an' dat pusson had trouble after dat, an' anyhow she tuk to drink, so I jes' changed dat chile's name fear she might inherit it."—New York Press.

Doctor's Advice.

"Is my husband's case serious, doctor?"

"It is very grave, madam. I have left an opiate."

"How often shall I give it to him?"

"He needs absolute rest and quiet. Don't give it to him. Take it yourself."—Collier's.

Looping the Loop

[Original.]

"Mother," said a frowsy girl with matted red hair, "I got an idea."

"What is it, Nan?" asked the mother.

"People has got used to my ridin' round the stage on my head on my bike, and the manager tole me last night that next week I was to git out. That set me to thinkin', and I've just hit on somepin better. I'm goin' to shoot down an incline, up a loop, cross a break, up another incline and across another break and off the stage."

"La' sakes, Nan; ye'll break yer neck!"

"You bet I won't."

The next week the billposters were putting up flaming pictures of Mlle. Yvonne Pasconnu, recently from Paris, double looping the loop. The performance was to take place at the same theater where Fanny Anderson, alias Nan Brennan, had been performing her astonishing bicycle feats, which were now to be outdone by the daring Mlle. Pasconnu.

The small boys looked at the pictures and began to save their pennies for a gallery admission. Men wondered if the feat were to be done without a net; women declared the performance vulgar, but wanted to see it. On the night of the first performance long before the curtain rose "Standing Room Only" placards were put up, and there was very little of that. The audience waited impatiently while the other varieties were gone through with, and when the last, the double looping the loop by Mlle. Yvonne Pasconnu, came round, the house was on the tiptoe of expectation. The curtain was down for a quarter of an hour, and behind it the moving of frames and the pounding of hammers could be distinctly heard. Then, after the orchestra had exhausted itself, the curtain was pulled up and revealed the structure on which the feat of the evening was to be performed.

When mademoiselle came on the stage, there was deafening applause. Fanny Anderson had worn her own Irish red hair and white and rose complexion—without the freckles—but Mlle. Yvonne Pasconnu's hair was a raven black, and her complexion was of an olive tint. As she came tripping forward in her tight costume not one of the audience saw in the little French girl with a bridged nose the Irish Fanny Anderson with her nasal pug. After bowing to several rounds of applause mademoiselle approached a silver mounted bicycle, with a glittering jewel in each end of the handle bar, leaning against a wing, and inspected it carefully; then, going to the foot of the loop structure, she walked slowly up it, testing it at different points, picking up a nutshell, a bit of wood, a piece of rope, and throwing them down on the stage.

While this was going on a super took the wheel off the stage. Mademoiselle after walking through the loop and looking up at each of the two breaks or intervals, as if wondering if it would be possible to shoot them in safety, stood on a platform high above the stage and made a farewell bow; then she disappeared through a door, and the audience waited breathlessly, every eye fixed on a door above leading on to the loop.

The orchestra had been playing during the inspection, but ceased as soon as mademoiselle disappeared. During the three minutes that elapsed between her disappearance and the opening of the door leading on to the loop there was not a word spoken in the audience.

Suddenly mademoiselle on her bicycle shot out and descended the first incline of the loop. The audience had expected to see her figure rounded down to the hazardous work; but, though she moved so rapidly that they could not follow her distinctly, she seemed to sit as though a thorough abandonment to forces beyond her control was far safer than any effort on her part.

When she had passed the first break in safety there was a sigh of relief in the audience. The second break was shorter and the radius of the loop less. She passed it and in a twinkling shot off the stage.

Then there were a terrific burst of applause and an encore. After a long interval mademoiselle came out, bowed, disappeared and in a few minutes again, seated on her wheel, burst into view.

There was no diminution to the thrill which had pervaded the audience at the first trial. Again mademoiselle sat her wheel as if resigned to whatever her fate might be and committing herself to force. She safely passed the first loop, and with slightly diminishing speed came to the second. This time the fore wheel struck against the woodwork on the other side of the break and mademoiselle, head down, fell to the bottom of the loop.

A thrill of horror ran through the audience. Before the result of the accident could be determined the curtain was rung down. Women fainted, men shuddered, while some left the theater immediately, not caring to hear the announcement that mademoiselle had been killed outright. In a few minutes the manager stepped before the curtain and announced that the wonder of agility had fallen on her hands and feet and was but slightly injured and would repeat the performance the next evening.

* * * * * * *

"How d' ye come out Nan?" asked her mother when the acrobat went home.

"Bloomin'. The wax figure worked noble. Got a tumble on second break. If they hadn't got the curtain down mighty quick there'd 'a' been a bad slip. When they picked up the figure it was all in pieces."

RALPH EDWARD WALLACE.

The Sublime Glory of American Liberty

By United States Senator CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW

IN our American list of things to be proud of we have one which is superior to that possessed by ANY OTHER nation in the present or in the past. It is American liberty! American liberty has a quality which no republic possessed in ancient, mediaeval or modern times. The struggle of people to be free has been going on ever since Christ declared for the equality and the freedom of mankind, but so firm, so strong, so steel clasped, so unbreakable, were the shackles of custom, of caste and OF PRIVILEGE that for nearly two thousand years the struggle for liberty in every country was the struggle FOR THE LIBERTY OF THE FEW.

The republics of Italy were only republics in name and died because they did not have the divine spark to keep alive their institutions. Runnymede is glorious, and the principles of Magna Charta are the charter of liberty, but at the time it was enunciated it was only liberty FOR THE BARONS. The Poles under Kosciusko and the Magyars under Kossuth, the Hollanders under William of Orange and the English under Cromwell did not fight for the liberties which WE understand and enjoy.

The pilgrims on Plymouth rock were the real revolutionists and the real rebels against British authority, kingly rule and a state church. The charter framed in the cabin of the Mayflower, with its declaration of just and equal rights, was the dynamite which has blown up thrones, broken the crust of caste AND DESTROYED THE POWER OF PRIVILEGE. It was the germ which, under the hand of Jefferson, flowered into the Declaration of Independence.

TO THE RESISTLESS FORCE OF THAT MAYFLOWER UTTERANCE OF 1620 OF THE EQUALITY OF ALL MEN BEFORE THE LAW CORNWALLIS SURRENDERED HIS SWORD AT YORKTOWN AND LEE AT APPOMATTOX.

The philosophers of the French revolution thought they understood liberty, but they were misled by the old idea that every man is absolutely at liberty to do as he wishes; that he has surrendered certain of his inalienable rights to the community and, in certain contingencies, may take them back.

That is not AMERICAN liberty. That is a false doctrine. Cain believed that when he killed Abel. But in the family of Adam the liberty of every child was a liberty to work out the best and highest destiny possible, WITH A DUE REGARD TO THE RIGHTS OF EVERY OTHER MEMBER OF THE FAMILY. Nothing was surrendered, because nothing was ever granted to any man who wronged his neighbor! We live in a period when it is our pride to say—and it is the truth—that our nation is freer from perils and dangers of every kind than it has been at any other period of its existence.

A nation that has uprooted slavery, a nation that has throttl anarchy, a nation that has overcome bankruptcy and risen triumphantly into financial integrity need fear no peril for the future.

I HAVE NO PATIENCE WITH THE WEAK KNEED, SPINDLE SHANKED, HOLLOW STOMACHED, WATER BRAINED AND SPIRIT LOGGED CREATURES WHO DESPAIR OF THIS REPUBLIC.

Varying Estimates of Goodness

By LILLIAN RUSSELL, Operatic Star

GOODNESS—beauty—wisdom. And the GREATEST of these for woman or man is WISDOM.

"Goodness" is such a comparative term. It is so much more difficult to say who is good than to say who is beautiful or wise. What is virtue on earth may be vice in Mars, and certainly what is merit in New York is demerit in Constantinople. Even in one place IDEAS OF GOODNESS vary exceedingly. Most people believe that in my sex chastity means goodness, while I have heard it urged that charity, generosity and loyalty are finer traits. One thing may be taken as irrefutable—only the wise woman deserves the credit of being a good woman. Others are accidents.

Without underrating the desirability or the power of goodness I think it worth mention that the women remembered through the ages are the WISE women rather than the GOOD women. Perhaps this is because goodness is more common than wisdom. Acknowledge this, and, from the commercial viewpoint, I have proved my contention.

Beauty as an influence is much overrated. It is an entirely transitory power which, if I may make a paradox, does not live even through its own life.

A WISE WOMAN WILL RETAIN HER SWAY OVER THE MINDS OF MEN THRICE AS LONG AS A WOMAN WHO IS MERELY BEAUTIFUL.

In every decade we have women who are prominent by reason of their faces and their figures, but who never achieve anything worth having—at least, not by that means alone. Moreover, beauty is a temptation and a danger. TO THE WOMAN WHO IS NOT ALSO WISE IT IS A FATALITY.

From the days of Greece the woman WITH BRAINS has been a queen. One recalls her with reverence where her merely lovely sister is thought of with condescension. Helen of Troy is a joke; she would have been a nonentity but for the bloodshed and rapine she brought about. On the other hand, one cannot admire Pericles without admiring Aspasia, Socrates without Diotima, Pompey without Cornelia, Seneeus without Marcia and Helvia, Epicurus without Lantium, Lucius Burus without Panthea, or even Diogenes without the girl who was half his intellect.

Remember I am not saying aught against the beauty of goodness or the goodness of beauty. I merely declare that I would rather have been Elizabeth Barrett Browning than any other creature of my sex in history. In the choice between the three traits given I remember that there is one which comprehends all.

WHO IS WISE IS LIKELY ALSO TO BE GOOD AND BEAUTIFUL.

NEW SHORT STORIES

English Humor.

Charles M. Pepper, the newspaper man who was appointed a commissioner on the intercontinental railway commission, tells an amusing story, in which the main figure is Henry Norman, the British journalist. Norman visited Washington a few years ago.

One evening just before the departure of the Britisher it was determined to put up a joke on him at the Press club. A Mr. Decker was selected to be the perpetrator. This gentleman arose in his seat and, taking a small bell from his pocket, addressed Mr. Norman as follows:

"Sir, I have been designated by my fellow members to convey to you an expression of our pleasure. On behalf of the National Press club of Washington I am instructed to give you this ring."

"I AM INSTRUCTED TO GIVE YOU THIS RING."

As he uttered the word "ring" Mr. Decker rapped the bell smartly and placed it on the table.

It was plainly to be seen that the Englishman was taken aback. After a good deal of hemming and hawing he replied:

"Mr. Decker and members of the National Press club, words fail me. I am overwhelmed. With respect to this gift, which I am pleased to receive, I suppose that Mr. Decker, as was only natural in the embarrassment of the moment, for we newspaper men are notoriously poor speakers, has made a mistake, for he has, as you see, given me a bell instead of a ring."—Denver Republican.

The Woman or the Lion?

In our big fire at winter quarters one of the best lions got free and took refuge in a barn, writes Samuel Hopkins Adams in McClure's. The inhabitating cow said something to him that he didn't like, and the lion killed her. Out came the woman of the house with a bale stick and sailed into the lion. Being the king of beasts, the intruder was scared almost to death, because his assailant was not afraid at all. At the first blow he retreated, snarling, into the dimmest corner. The woman's husband arrived with a gun and fired several shots into the darkness. Result, he destroyed a piece of property worth hundreds of dollars, when by merely shutting the barn door he would have kept the animal perfectly harmless until we could have got to him. Presently the trainer came hurrying up.

"Have you seen anything of a lion in your barn?"

"Lion!" screeched the woman. "I thought it was a dog."

Over she went in a dead faint and cut her head open. What does the husband do but want damages for her injuries and that after killing our high priced animal. Well, he didn't get any damages.

Helpless.

H. C. Barnabee, the veteran actor, lay disabled from a fall and listened to the condolences of a dramatic critic.

"For years and years," the writer said, "you haven't missed a performance. Now, here you lie, helpless as a corpse."

"As helpless as a corpse," said Mr. Barnabee, "or as helpless as two inebriates of whom I heard the other day.

"These two men had dined together and after dinner had sat too long over their coffee, their liquor, their brandy and so on. When it came time for them to go home they were in a very bad way, helpless, in fact. They leaned on one another, going with linked arms, but each, as a reed to lean on, was rotten.

"Finally they fell, and, with a loud splash, they rolled into a full gutter. A police officer appeared and grabbed the upper man by the collar.

"'No, no. Save my friend. Never mind me. I can swim.'"—San Antonio Express.

He Burned Wood.

"There is an old negro down in my town," said John Sharp Williams, "who did me a service, and I wanted to reward him, so I said:

"'Uncle, which shall I give you, a ton of coal or a bottle of whisky?'

"'Foah de Lawd, Massa John,' he replied, 'you all shorely knows I burn wood.'"

Senator Hoar's Epigram.

The late Senator Hoar said of his dead friend, the late Senator Davis of Minnesota, "No spark from his train was ever a cinder in the eye of a friend."

Fort Fisher's Bloody Walls

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

January 15, 1865

[Copyright, 1905, by G. L. Kilmer.]

IT was after 3 p. m. on Jan. 15, 1864, when the Federal division of General A. A. Ames gained a footing on the ruined parapet of Fort Fisher. Ames had put in General Curtis' brigade first and followed up with the brigades of Colonel Louis Bell and Colonel Pennypacker. This column drove the Confederate garrison headed by General Whiting and Colonel William Lamb from about one-quarter of the land face. A charge of the Federal naval brigade along the sand beach had just been repulsed. The Federal commander of the land assault on Fort Fisher, General A. H. Terry, had detached General Paine's division to hold a line across the peninsula upon which Fort Fisher stood in order to prevent a Confederate attack in the rear by troops from Wilmington. While the garrison had been devoting its fire to the repulse of the naval brigade on the sea face Ames' brigades stormed the land face, and before dark the opposing ranks occupied contiguous portions of the same parapet.

It now became a soldiers' fight in every sense of the word, because there was but little chance of unity of action either with the Confederate or Federal troops. The traverses, ranged all along the main parapet and extending thirty feet to the rear, with their shot proof sides and numerous passages, were so many little forts, and the capture of any one of them by Ames' men simply drove the defenders back to another one. The Confederates, having the interior and knowing the ground, were able to haul cannon out of the gun chambers and fire across the space where the assailants must advance. But the entering wedge had been driven by Curtis' brigade. The portion of the works held by him was a protection to a flanking column which formed on the interior of the main parapet and swept around in rear of the row of traverses. This compelled the garrison to come out of their citadels and fight in open ground or be captured in them.

For a time the Confederates met this flank attack from behind an old breastwork that extended along the interior plane of the inclosure. Colonel Lamb, who was alive to every opportunity to dispute Ames' advance, now went along the batteries south toward the point and directed a heavy fire to be thrown into the northwest portion of the work, where the danger was so threatening. On his way he ordered every available man forward to the first traverse ahead of Ames' men, and on his return he found that traverse still held by his stubborn soldiers, although the slaughter among them had been appalling. The fire from the fleet had scooped out graves in the sand, and his dead were lying in them as they fell, half buried by the showers of dust thrown out by the bursting shells. Great timbers, gun carriages and even cannon, broken by the huge missiles from the fleet, were lying in heaps, and on and around them were the dead who had vainly tried to defend them.

The advance of Ames' men had been arrested, and Colonel Lamb summoned all his force to the front traverse, with the determination to charge upon the assailants and drive them out. Signals were sent to the gunners in the fort to withhold their fire on the position held by the Federals during this countercharge. The distance between the combatants was not above a hundred feet, and, calling on men and officers to follow, Lamb leaped the breastworks, with the order: "Charge bayonets! Forward! Double quick! March!" Instantly a Federal bullet entered his right hip, and he sank on the works. Ames' men poured a heavy volley of bullets into the Confederates, and the latter fell back behind cover.

Colonel Lamb was taken to a bomb proof, and the command was given to Major James Reilly, Tenth North Carolina artillery, who agreed to continue the struggle so long as he had a man left. General Whiting had previously been disabled by a mortal wound. Colonel Lamb at once telegraphed to his chief, General Bragg, at Wilmington, for assistance, and Major Reilly, taking up the fight where it had halted through the wounding of the commandant, succeeded by a brave rally in driving out the Federal flanking column that had got inside the works. But this effort of the Confederates depleted their numbers engaged on the traverses, and an advance of a new force, under Colonel Abbott of General Paine's division, on the left of Ames' brigades, which until now had contended alone, captured some of the traverses between this point and the sea.

The Confederates still looked to their wounded leaders, Whiting and Lamb, for inspiration, and at 8 o'clock word was carried to them that the ammunition was giving out, the cartridge boxes of the dead having been emptied to supply the men on the works. Both Lamb and Whiting replied that help would come from Bragg and the work must not be surrendered. In an hour word was brought that the sally port had been carried by the assailants, and there was no line to oppose Terry's advance. It was now dark, and the progress of the assault was necessarily slow. The combatants were so close as to fire into one another at arm's length. All of the Confederate wounded were removed to Battery Buchanan, near the river and farther down toward the point. Confederate vessels had been able to land here during the fight and bring dispatches from Wilmington. This work was a defense of the river channel, but was of little use to aid Fort Fisher with its guns. Its small garrison, however, had volunteered to join the garrison of the larger work. The sand plain between Fort Fisher and Battery Buchanan was swept by the guns of the Federal fleet and also by the guns of the Confederate battery. If this plain could be put between the defeated Confederates and their foes darkness might aid them to escape on vessels to Wilmington. A rear guard was formed from the sound men of the garrison, and the sick and wounded were sent on ahead with the leaders, Whiting and Lamb. On arriving at Battery Buchanan the guns were found spiked and the men who had been left to defend it, with all the officers, had sailed away to Wilmington.

The Confederate rear guard made the best fight they could, yielding inch by inch, and it was 10 o'clock, or seven hours after the fight began, when the last traverse and battery were in Terry's hands. When this occurred, many of the Confederates took to the water of Cape Fear river and were rescued by their vessels. The men who reached Battery Buchanan were surrendered during the night, the leaders, Whiting and Lamb, being among them.

The victory was complete, but it had not been won without heavy cost. The three brigade commanders of Ames' division had been stricken down on the works. General Curtis was wounded at the head of his men while leading them, rifle in hand, up to the palisades. He was struck by canister. Colonel Pennypacker was wounded seriously while planting the colors of one of his regiments on a parapet that he had been the first to scale. Colonel Louis Bell was mortally wounded after he had passed the palisades. Colonel J. W. Moore, commanding the Two Hundred and Third Pennsylvania volunteers, was killed while crossing a traverse and waving the colors of his regiment.

In the conflict Curtis' brigade lost 223 men; Pennypacker's lost 278 and Bell's 113. Abbott's brigade, which came to the support of Ames after his division had conquered the main part of the fort, lost twenty-seven men in all. Curtis' brigade comprised four regiments, Pennypacker's five and Bell's four.

Under date of Jan. 17, 1865, two days after the battle, Secretary of War Stanton, who went to the scene as soon as the victory was announced, wrote a letter from Fortress Monroe to President Lincoln at Washington. After describing the general battle and the futile assault by a naval column upon the sea front of the fort his report continues:

"The assault on the other and most difficult side of the fort was made by a column of 3,000 troops of the old Tenth corps, led by Colonel Curtis under the immediate supervision of General Terry."

In a dispatch to General Grant dated the same day Secretary Stanton said that he got the particulars of the fight from Admiral Porter and General Terry. In view of the fact that General Terry immediately wrote to Washington recommending Ames for promotion for his gallantry at Fort Fisher and in his preliminary official report, sent forward the night of the battle, said the assault was made by Ames' division and mentioned Curtis' brigade, naming each specifically as Ames' division and Curtis' brigade, it is not probable that Stanton received from him directly or through others anything to warrant the statement that Curtis led the storming column. Hence the secretary must have received that erroneous information from Admiral Porter, who was on board the flagship throughout the battle and unable to know the facts at first hand. The error published by Secretary Stanton evidently became the basis for all accounts of the affair given by writers at the time and by historians.

The Man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

SOME REASONS WHY PEOPLE ARE SETTLING IN MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA.

Because it is the best country known to the man of moderate means.
Because you will find a country of rich soil awaiting the settler.
Because there are uplands, prarieland, and alluvial river bottoms.
Because you can be certain of profitable returns from whatever you put into the soil.
Because the winter does not consume what the summer produces.
Because there are more and better opportunities for deversified farming than elsewhere.
Because the seasons are regular and no fear of crop failure.
Because the country is never scourged by cyclones and devastating storms and blizzards.
Because everything grown elsewhere can be produced here more abundantly.
Because truck farming is a success; products being early on the market obtain high prices.
Because no better fruit country is known, oranges, plums, peaches, pears, apples, grapes, strawberries, figs, pecans and other fully maturing.
Because there are more chances for profitable investment of capital than elsewhere in this country.
Because for healthfulness this section is unequalled on the face of the globe.
Because you have no long winter months to encounter, with no excessive dry heat in summer.
Because the climate is more uniform than elsewhere, no extremes of heat or cold.
Because you will find the as orderly communities as anywhere on this continent.
Because you will find the most open-hearted people on the globe.
Because education is paramount; public schools and churches of every denomiuation are to be found in all communities.
Because the railroad facilities of this section are unexcelled, a double tracked railroad traversing the entire length of both states.
Because really good lands are yet cheap.
Because the geographical location of these states gives them the best markets in the United States.

We secure land for home-seekers or for colonies. Write to-day for full particulars and letters from Northern farmers already located in the South.

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

Rev. E. Manges, of the Ev. Lutheran church, preached Friday, Saturday and Sunday in his church, to appreciative audiences at all these services. His communion service on Sabbath, conflicting with both our young ministers of the Baptist and M. E. churches, they both gracefully gave way and discontinued their services out of respect to the senior minister of this God-fearing trio. They are three of the most sincere Christian workers that have ever graced our town, working in harmony for the betterment of humanity along the undenominational line.

Mr. W. W. Hennen, the efficient engineer of the B. & O. railroad, located with his cultured family at this place, we are truly sorry to state is quite indisposed at his cozy cottage on Main street with a severe cold and all indications of the grip, but with the care of one of the best companions a man can have in this life, we feel sure he will soon be able to resume his duties at the throttle.

Rev. Percy W. Metheny, of the M. E. church, is holding a series of cottage meetings at different christian homes, preparatory to a revival service in his church, commencing on the 22d inst. He is receiving the active aid of all the members of the different church organizations. His subject for Sabbath night next will be "Church Unity and Christian Fellowship." This young divine has won the hearts of this people in his but recent advent in our midst, and we feel assured with his gentle bearing and non-sectarian bias his ministry will be crowned with success for the Master's cause.

It was the pleasure of the writer, in company with Rev. W. H. Faust, to visit the home of our friend, the venerable Judge A. J. Wilson, of Wilson Station, on the B. & O. railroad, on Monday last, the former to attend to some official business for the Judge, the latter to pay his respects to this grand man, now in his 90th year, with all his mental faculties as bright, seemingly, as they were forty or more years ago, when we, as a boy, first met and made his acquaintance. As the years have flitted into the past, and as from year to year we have met, we have learned to love and venerate this just and nonest man. At this advanced age, he can write his name just as legible as he ever did and without the use of glasses. We can only occount for this mental vigor from the fact that intoxicants never passed his lips, and that he never indulged in the use tobacco in any way. It was also a pleasure, at this palatial home, to meet his cultured niece, Mrs. Stella Feeley, of Parsons, West Va., and also Miss Florence DeWitt, the efficient teacher of the Wilson school. The winning smiles of this fair damsel soon won the heart of our traveling companion. At this 10 o'clock p. m., Jan. 17th, as we hear the jingle of his sleigh bells we fully realize the young Rev. and Prof. Bert Browning are just returning from the home of Judge Wilson where the fair Miss Florence makes her home for the scholastic year.

Again, Mr. Editor, we can't refrain from mentioning another visit of today (16th) to that noted farm of Col. George Treusdell in company with an old friend from my native district No. 8, Mr. Marcellus Wolf, who is visiting his uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. John Snyder, of this place. Having on this occasion some official business requiring a witness, we called on this old friend of thirty years ago, to accompany us, and in our meanderings we called at the home of our friend, Mr. L. T. Friend, and his hospitable wife, both Friends by name and nature, and after a sumptuous dinner at his beautiful home, and by the kind courtesy of two of his noble boys we were driven to the famous "Altamont Springs Sheep Farm," calling on the genial manager and the two gallant Highland Shepherds, Messrs. W. H. Chadderton, Hugh Calderwood and Wm. Crawford, by the 'pone that we would be there for the special benefit of this friend. After inspecting the vast products of the mammoth farm with its 2000 acres of farming and grazing land, we shown through the five barns with all their modern improvements, and all the machinery of every known variety to run a first class farm, then the root cellars with their one hundred tons of turnips, cabbage by the hundreds of tons, and with feeding to the 340 head of sheep one ton of each a day, they will have after April the 1st, a car load of each variety to sell. And now we come to the inspection of this famous herd. "The Grand Duke," registered the finest sheep in the world, and with the prize winners at the late World's Fair at St. Louis, was a site to for my friend to behold. But I am sorry to report to Col. Treusdell, through and by the orders of his faithful shepherds, and sanction of the manager, that this is the first time this herd of sheep worth from $25 to $1000 apiece was invaded by that worst emeny to this innocent of all the domestic animals, yes, Mr. Editor, this herd worth, at the lowest value, more than $40,000, was invaded by a Wolf, the largest that was ever caught, but before captured this ferocious beast had torn large bunches of wool out of the most valuable ones, the prize winners and even The Grand Duke were attacked, and much of this valuable wool torn out that is worth from 50 cents to $1 per lb., and only the heroism of these faithful shepherds was this vast herd saved, for after capture he was weighed and tipped the beam at 225 pounds. This is the first Wolf that has been seen in this vicinity for some years, but yet the manager released him and even invited this monster to come again. As his name appears in this paragraph and he hails from my native heath, we are glad he was released from captivity and we say in behalf of Deer Park friends come again Marcellus (Wolf) and you will be feasted on spring lamb raised on Treusdell Heights and you will open your eyes and see sights. If you only wait until Col. Burnwell turns on the electric lights—

And Deer Park gets rid of this fleece of frost,
With the sun melting it with its radiant glory,
And then we can talk and tell
How we inspected the herd of Col. Treusdell,
And sip the current wine of our Friend
Whose wife to a sick lady did send.

Rev. W. H. Clary, of the U. B. church, is assisting Rev. Mr. Price in his revival services at Swanton this week and report say they are having grand meetings and attended by large audiences. Swanton is noted for its church going citizens. Rev. Clary is one of God's noble ministers and holds fraternal fellowship with all orthordox denominations. May God's blessings rest abundantly on all ministers.

Twelve o'clock this Tuesday, 17th January, midnight, and as we say good morning and welcome in the 18th and hope to hear from the old REPUBLICAN on the 19th at 5:45 p. m.

With pleasant dreams to the Editor and the Wolf, we say once again.

MORE ANON.

BITTINGER.

The Lutheran pastor at this place, Rev. J. B. Shoup, is now in the midst of a series of meetings which will continue throughout the week, to be followed by communion services on Sabbath morning, Jan. 22nd, at 10:30 o'clock.

A party consisting of the following named gentlemed passed through here last Friday afternoon enroute for Hoyes where they were to attend the meeting of The Garrett County Telepone Co., on Saturday: Messrs. William and Frank Broadwater, Madison Durst and P. P. McAndrew.

Prof. E. S. Brenneman went to Grantsville last Saturday on a business trip.

Mr. Daniel Knox, who is now employed in the Meyersdale bakery, was visiting his parents a few days last week, and was seen shaking hands with friends at this place.

Mr. Christian J. Beachy who made a dash for Oklahama last fall, is back and fills up these stormy days recounting his experiences to his delighted friends.

Mr. Albert Brenneman and family drove over to Pennsylvania last Sunday for a brief visit to Mrs. Brenneman's parents.

Mr. Silas C. Beachy drove a herd of beef cattle through here last week. The beasts were destined for the George's Creek market.

We hear many expressions among the Lutheran brethern here of deep sympathy with their brethern at Oakland by reason of the recent destruction of their beautiful church edifice by fire.

GRANTSVILLE.

We are having a severe snow storm in this vicinity.

Misses Blanch and Gertrude Londerbaugh, after spending a pleasant vacation with their parents, returned to Kee Mar College, Hagerstown, Md., to resume their studies.

Mr. B. T. Keller, formerly a student of Grantsville school, has gone to Lancaster, Pa., where he will attend the Franklin-Marshal College during the spring term. His mother accompanied him as far as Cumberland, where she will remain a few days visiting friends.

Miss Nellie Bevans left last Saturday for Connellsville, Pa., to complete her course in music.

Miss Rebecca Bevans is visiting friends in Meyersdale, Pa.

Mr. Harry Bevans went to McKeesport, Pa., where he will work for the Pittsburg Iron & Steel Co.

Messrs. James and Thomas Younkin have gone to the North Lumber Co., near Accident to seek employment.

Dr. Chas. Beachy returned home last week and expects to remain here until spring.

Miss Emma Cochran spent a few days last week at her home in Salisbury, Pa.

Mr. H. M. Fogle, of Salisbury, Pa., is visiting his sisters, Mrs. J. J. and Mrs. S. O. Bender.

Sixteen young ladies of Salisbury, Pa., took supper and spent the evening pleasantly at the Castleman Hotel last Saturday.

The literary society rendered an excellent program last Friday night.

Mr. David Broadwater, his two daughters and two sons, of Red Hill, and Miss Tressler, teacher of the Red Hill school, attended the literary here on last Friday evening.

Miss Lula Layman and Messrs. Geo. Pope, A. Fike, Harvey Croft and Albert Baker, all of Mt. Zion, also attended the literary.

Mr. Pete Livengood, editor of the Somerset county Star, was in town distributing calendars to the bussness men Saturday.

Jennings Bros'. railroad is doing a thriving business. From 12 to 15 car loads of lumber are being shipped each week.

Messrs. P. A. Bevans, Mahlon Warnick, Irving Broadwater, Malcolm Macfarlan, Joseph Keefe and Ray Bevans, all of Jennings, took supper at the Castleman Hotel last Sunday, after which they attended the Epworth League at the M. E. church.

ACCIDENT

Mr. J. L. Englehart had a lively auction sale at his store on the 14th inst.

Fred Miller has returned from his extensive visit west and reports a most pleasant and profitable trip.

A pleasing literary program was rendered at Mahlon Speicher's school last Friday afternoon. We were pleased to notice a number of the Accident students and others present.

On Friday evening, 27th inst., at 7 p. m. the local institute of Accident will render the following program:

Salutatory, Margaret Snyder; declamation, Earl Ault; select readings, Prema Schlossnagle, Alvin Englehart; recitations, Ethel Speicher, Lena Ravenscroft, Leota Shartzer; declamations, Clayton Englehart, Earl Speicher, Lawrence Speicher; music; select readings, Alvey Spoerlein, Gertrude Richter; dialogue; reading, Effie Gnagey; recitations, Emma Ault, Emma Bowman; concert recitation, Leota Richter, Emma Goehringer, Flossie Spoerlein, Grace Beeghley and Vesta Beeghley; recitations, Elsie Goehringer, Amelia Ries, Sadie Spoerlein; dialogue; recitations, Emma Richter, Ettie Bowser, Maude Spoerlein; music; remarks by Prof. E. A. Browning; debate, Resolved, "That old Bachelors should be Taxed to support old Maids," affirmative, John Friend, Adam Richter; negative, John Gies, Fred Miller; music. On Saturday, at 9 a. m., the following will be taken up:

Devotional exercises, conducted by Rev. Mr. Blievernicht.

Music.

"What a Teacher should Read and Why," Prof. E. A. Browning.

"The Relation of School Officers to Teachers," George E. Bishoff.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Paugh and three children were taken desperately ill on last Monday evening immediately after supper. The father, mother and children partook heartily of lima beans that had been cooked for the evening meal and it is supposed that poison of some kind, presumably "rough on rats" got mixed in some unaccountable way with the cooking. Three of the family who did not eat the lima beans escaped. The afflicted people suffered a great pain and sick stomach and did not obtain any permanent relief until near midnight.

Mrs. Lida Strachan and little daughter, of Savage, left Piedmont on No. 4 Wednesday morning to join her husband, Dr. Hugh Strachan, who is located near Antlers, I. T.

The first meeting in the new M. E. church occurred on last Sunday afternoon. Sabbath school was held in the class room of the new edifice for the first time since the old church was vacated—some time in October.

Mr. Richard Wildman, as well known here as in the community in which he lives, near Savage, has been critically ill for the past four or five days. Absent members of the family have been summoned and are present at his bedside.

Mr. W. H. Brydon returned last Monday from a business trip to the eastern cities.

Miss Fannie Leps, of Keyser, has succeeded Miss Pearl Merrill as teacher of the Bond school.

Rev. J. R. Snedegar has been in Harrisburg, Pa., for the past ten days on business.

Mr. J. L. McKenzie, formerly a merchant of this place, now a prominent citizen and substantial business man of Howesville, W. Va., was in town Tuesday, called to the bedside of his sick friend and former associate in business, Mr. Richard Wildman.

Rev. Howard's condition is considerably improved.

Opposition they say is the life of trade. We had the opposition Saturday night, pay day night, between our two saloons and we had things lively too. Both places set out sumptuous lunches of chicken, oysters, ham and other things equally as good. High balls, low balls, beer and hot drinks kept things from being cold and formal and were just out of sight.

The infant child of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Kline, of Seldom Seen, died last week and was buried in the Bloomington cemetery on last Friday.

Mr. Jonathan Radcliffe, of Savage, returned on last Monday from Dayton, Ohio, where he had gone to attend the funeral of his father-in-law, Mr. John Bishoff.

Miss Minnie Barker, of Swanton, is with her sister, Mrs. James Coffman, during the latter's illness.

Mrs. Anna Kemp, wife of Dr. Kemp, is visiting relatives and friends in Frostburg and Cumberland.

A spirited revival has been going on for the past three weeks at Barnum. The whole country side has been warmed up, many professed conversion and the altar still crowded with seekers.

Our base ball players are about equally divided between Cumberland and Piedmont. Messrs. Hugh Bates, John Raley and Russel Pattison have signed contracts with the former team, while "Big Dan" Raley and his brother Ross have offered their signatures to a Piedmont contract. We understand the salaries to be paid the above named players would make many a bank cashier smile and will be up in three figures.

Mr. William Moody, one of our merchants, who was confined to his room two or three days last week with rheumatism, is out again hustling along in old time form.

HUTTON

There is somewhat of an epidemic of tonsilitis in town.

Hubert Casseday was on the program to sing at Newburg last Saturday night.

Miss Corinne Manges, of Oakland is visiting Miss Marie Grusendorf for a day or two.

Jerome Kesner will move from the Kuykendall place to one of D. E. Offutt's farms near Oakland.

Rev. E. Manges came up last Thursday to fill his regular appointment but adjourned services for one week on account of the inclemency of the weather.

VOLUME 28. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1905. NUMBER 48

EULOGISTIC OF THE LATE GOVERNOR LOWNDES.

Tributes of the Court and Bar of Allegany County.

MR. JACOB BROWN MADE ADDRESS

In Which He Reviewed the Life of the Distinguished Marylander—An Eloquent Tribute to the Character of the Deceased.

When Captain R. H. Gordon at Cumberland, on Saturday afternoon, presented to the court the resolutions adopted by the bar and bar association upon the death of the late Governor Lowndes he paid an individual tribute to the character and life work of the departed, which, notwithstanding the solemnity and sadness of the occasion, was pleasant to listen to.

Mr. James W. Thomas, Ex-Judge Williams and Mr. B. A. Richmond each in touching phrases conveyed to their hearers, in extemporaneous speech, thoughts most beautiful in memory of their much respected professional frater.

Mr. Jacob Brown, the nestor of the bar, who, during more than a half century of connection with the legal fraternity in this county, has participated in memorial occasions oftener perhaps than any other Allegany county lawyer, living or dead, spoke as follows:

"Upon an occasion similar to the one now to be treated, at the October court, 1902, upon the death of Judge David W. Sloan, I uttered the following sentence: 'It was not at all expected that during the small remnant of my quiet life, I should feel it my duty to perform a function such as this, but so it has happened.' This remark can now be re-uttered with more reality and solemnity than then.

"It was said years ago, 'Death loves a shining mark.' It was really so in the case we are endeavoring to memorialize. Death came suddenly, unexpectedly, and without the least warning to its victim, or any one else. Still, the unerring mind of God made the call in His own way and time, and we are here to submit, though it be in the depths of sorrows. Bereavements similar to the one we are now endeavoring to emphasize, have been of frequent occurrence to this bar in late years. No one has seen or felt more of them than the one now addressing this appreciating court.

"Lloyd Lowndes was born and reared to young manhood in West Virginia and came from an ancient Maryland family. He wisely chose the latter state for his residence and seat of business. Early as 1868, when he was admitted to the bar, after a thorough training at a law institution. He had the practice of the law in view when admitted, with fair prospects of success and abilities, but soon thereafter his splendid business capabilities led him to other pursuits more congenial and remunerative. Success promptly followed, to last, and to increase largely, as long as life lasted. His connection with business enterprises were very numerous; all of a healthful and profitable kind. As early as 1873 he became the president of the Second National Bank of Cumberland, Maryland, the most extensive banking institution in the state, outside of Baltimore city, which place he filled to the day of his death. Here, too, his financial abilities were shown by the remarkable success of that institution. He began as the youngest bank president in the state, and held the place thirty-two years. The extent of his great wealth is not yet known, but it is well known it came from legitimate, fair and wise dealings during an extensive and long business career. None of it was the product of mere speculation—foresight and care, rather.

Notwithstanding his vast business relations, he had a taste for decent politics, and did not shun office when properly offered. At the early age of twenty-eight years, Congressional honors sought him, when he had no thought of them. They came as a kind surprise, as I happened to know. This was in 1872. The executiveship of his adopted state sought him in 1895, with a clever majority, with party odds against him. These were all the offices he ever filled. He was not an office-seeker, but an adherent of what he believed to be the principles and policies for his state and the nation. His acts and records while in these high and responsible offices were clean and beneficial in behalf of those who trusted him.

"In 1869, he was married to Elizabeth T. Lowndes, second daughter of the late Richard Lowndes, of Cumberland, Maryland. This was a suitable and lovable union in every way. Its fruits were five living sons: Lloyd, Richard T., Charles T., William Bladen and Tasker: only daughter, Elizabeth L., unmarried. As a husband, he was devoted and affectionate to a reciprocating and appreciating wife. The union was in every way a happy and felicitous one. As a parent, he he was kind and protecting, but watchful and judicious in his cares over a large family of children. The bereaved wife has been left, out of a large worldly fortune, all the comforts and even the luxuries of life, but th ese are no equivalents or substitutes for the loss of such a husband as she enjoyed for over a third of a century.

"Whilst Governor Lowndes was enterprising and progressive, he was never aggressive or offensive to others on the same lines with him; always conservative, and thoughtful in action and procedure—hence came success and great wealth, without harm or oppression of others. He had no wishes for show or display in social or business relations, always civil, polite and courteous with those who had business intercourse with him. Modesty was one of his traits, yet he was not lacking in decisions and action, whenever they were needed or appropriate. His manners, ways and habits were excellent; hence his many friends in life, and at his death, as shown by his imposing and sympathetic funeral.

The aggregate of his excellent traits and acts did not omit religion and church. Here, too, he was a prominent and useful actor. For many years an active member of the Episcopal Church, but he did not confine his many Christian and benevolent acts to that denomination alone. He always had a warm heart and an open hand for other forms of Christianity. The Young Men's Christian Association was one of his chief beneficiaries. He was a member of many orders or organizations of a beneficial and social character; his nature moved along these lines.

"It will be seen, if your Honors please, that I have made no attempt to eulogize or at panegyric, but simply to present a just and truthful tribute of respect and feeling for our departed brother and friend; showing him his worth, and merit as they existed, and were familiar to all who knew him in his life. Were he here to advise, I believe such would be his wish and direction."

ACCIDENT

The people of this place are making good use of the sleighing.

Quite a number of the young people attended the Institute at Friendsville last Friday night.

The Accident Literary Society rendered a very interesting program Friday afternoon.

Mrs. J. E. Gnagey left Monday for Huntington, Pa., where she is visiting her son Samuel who is attending college at that place.

Miss Nettie Fike who has been away on a vacation for three weeks, has returned and resumed her work as telephone girl.

Mr. and Mrs. Alva Thompson, of Eglon, W. Va., passed through here Sunday evening en route to Cove where they visited Mrs. T's. parents, Mr. David Hochstedler.

Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Speicher attended services at Bittinger Sunday.

Dr. W. Ravenscroft made a business trip to Oakland Saturday and returned Sunday.

Prof. Beahm and Mahlon Speicher attended the Institute at Friendsville Saturday.

Mr. F. P. Miller, Misses Margaret Snyder and Effie Gnagey were the guests of Misses Gertrude and Leola Richter Sunday evening last.

Messers. Fred, Wm. and Miss Lilly Menhorn attended the funeral of their brother George which took place last Wednesday at Johnsburg, Pa.

Died

HARVEY—Rachael Wilson Harvey was born at Kitzmillersville, Md., Feb. 12, 1816, and died near Kearney, Md., Jan. 5, 1905, aged 88 years 10 months and 24 days. She was married to Nathaniel B. TERRIFIC EXPLOSION OF A LOCOMOTIVE BOILER.

Frightful Disaster Occurred at Mountain Lake Park Last Sunday Morning.

TWO TRAINMEN KILLED AND TWO INJURED.

The Locomotive One of the Largest Operated By the Railway Company, Literally Blown to Pieces—Three Cars Also Wrecked—Horses in One of the Cars Escaped Injury.

One of the most frightful disasters occuring in recent years took place last Sunday mooning about nine o'clock at Mountain Lake Park, two miles east of Oakland, when the boiler of passenger engine No. 2000, drawing fast freight train No. 98, eastbound, exploded without a moment's warning, killing the fireman and front brakeman, and seriously injuring the engineer and slightly injuring the conductor.

The engine, a magnificent piece of machinery, recently out of the railroad company's shops at Mount Clare, Baltimore, where it had been thoroughly overhauled, was completely wrecked, the boiler being torn away from the running gear and almost blown to pieces—the wheels overturned and rendered practically useless.

Three cars were also wrecked. One of these, loaded with horses, was turned down the embankment upon its side, but the animals were all taken out uninjured. The track was considerably torn up and traffic interfered with several hours.

The monetary loss to the railway company will exceed $20,000, the locomotive alone being valued at $18,000.

At nine o'clock Sunday morning one of the rarest accidents in railroading took place a few hundred yards west of the Baltimore and Ohio station at Mountain Lake Park, two miles east of Oakland when the boiler of passenger engine No. 2000, exploded, resulting in the death of two men—the fireman of the locomotive and the front brakeman of the train who was riding on the engine—and the serious injury of the engineer and slight injuries to the conductor.

The dead are—

Fireman John L. Simpson, aged about 32 years, unmarried, who resided with his parents in South Cumberland, where they conducted a grocery store.

Brakeman Frank Johnson, of Baltimore, who boarded in Cumberland. He leaves no near relatives.

Engineer A. W. Stanhagen, also of South Cumberland, sustained a badly broken left leg and dislocated shoulder, besides a bruise to his right hip, the latter injury, however, being of a minor nature.

Conductor Howell, of Grafton, who was in the caboose at the time, was pitched against his desk by the sudden stoppage of the train and sustained a number of cuts to his head and face.

The explosion of the boiler occurred while the train was running at about twenty miles an hour and just as the engineer released the whistle lever after blowing for the signal at the Park tower. The boiler let go without the slightest warning, blowing Mr. Stanhagen through the cab window and for a distance of thirty feet down the embankment to the right of the track. He struck the earth in a marshy place, his body as it passed through the air describing the arc of a circle. Beside him was found one of the air chambers from the engine and also a piece of firebrick from the engine. The brick was still red hot and was so close that it set the unfortunate man's shoe on fire, but he succeeded by throwing snow on the fire to extinguish it. He was soon found by some citizens of Loch Lynn Heights and taken into Cuppett's store where he was kept until a team could be procured when he was conveyed to the McComas Sanitarium where his injuries were dressed by Drs. McComas and Legge. Mr. Stanhagen is still an inmate of the hospital here and will remain until he is entirely recovered.

The body of Fireman Simpson was found underneath the tender of the engine, which left the track. When found the man was still breathing, but so horribly scalded by escaping steam and water from the boiler that it was at once seen nothing could be done to save his life. He was brought to the hospital, however, and his last moments made as painless as possible. Death ensued about two hours afterward.

The body of Brakeman Johnson was blown forward from the boiler and was discovered lying on the track some fifty yards ahead of the point where the engine exploded. Johnson was dead when found, the entire back portion of his head having been blown away.

Conductor Howell's injuries were not of a serious nature. He was attended by Dr. McComas who bandaged his face and head.

The force of the explosion was so great that the boiler was stripped of cab, brass fittings, stack and other fixtures, torn from the wheels and blown ahead of the rest of the train for a distance of a hundred feet or more. The tremendous wheels and running gear which weigh fifteen to twenty tons, was turned completely over, the framework being twisted and torn in an inconceivable manner. The boiler after it left the trucks fell across the side track and west bound track, completely blocking both. From the appearance of the wrecked boiler the crownsheet was first to give way. This was stripped completely from the point where it was curved over the firebox and down one side, tearing way countless heavy stay-bolts. The front portion of the boiler was found several hundred feet ahead of the rest of the wreck.

The tender of the locomotive rolled and slipped down the embankment but was only slightly damaged.

Of the train but three cars were wrecked, one being loaded with horses, one with merchandise and one with beer. The stock car was the only one to leave the roadbed. It was thrown on its side and slid endwise down the bank. The horses were taken out after the end had been chopped way by some men living at Loch Lynn. The most remarkable thing being that none of the animals were seriously hurt. The other two wrecked cars remained on the roadbed. After the contents had been removed one was thrown over the bank where it was burned.

Engineer Stanhagan in conversation with the editor of this paper yesterday stated that he cannot account for the explosion of the boiler as it had been doing excellent service preceding the accident. The water guages showed plenty of water and no weakness had been noticed in any part of the machine. The engine had just been turned out of the repair shops at Mount Clare a month ago where it had been overhauled and made practically new. On Saturday Mr. Stanhagan had been assigned to this engine as his regular run, his trip Sunday being the first he had made.

The bodies of the two men killed were prepared for burial at the undertaking establishment of Messrs. Bolden & Co., and shipped to their respective homes on train No. 12 Sunday night. The funeral of Mr. Simpson took place from Piedmont yesterday. The body of Johnson was taken in charge by a friend who resided in Baltimore where the remains were buried Tuesday.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Master Paul Squires, the hustling agent of the Saturday Evening Post, manages to keep up his weekly sales of that paper, notwithstanding the limited winter population of this vicinity.

Messrs. Bittinger, of near this place, unloaded a car of lime last Monday.

Mr. Edward Sembowers is visiting friends at Burnsville, W. Va.

Mr. P. T. Lipscomb is visiting Pennsylvania friends.

Miss Weimer is visiting friends in Piedmont.

Tuesday an old time snow storm made its appearance.

Rev. Percy Metheney the pastor, preached an enjoyable sermon in the Methodist church of this place last Sabbath morning.

The friends were surprised a few days ago to learn of the marriage of Miss Alma Crane and Mr. Nelson Clary, on the 30th of August, 1904.

Miss Nellie Smouse and Mr. Calvin Gilpin were married on the 26th inst. and have gone to Cumberland, Md. to live.

The wreck train was only about seven hours cleaning up the remnants of the boiler explosion of Sabbath last.

Mr. J. A. Enlow, of Cumberland, was a business caller at the Park last Tuesday.

Mrs. S. E. Flowers, of Bond, Md., visited Mrs. Frank Arnold, of this place last Monday.

Mr. A. L. Scott, has returned from an enjoyable visit to "Old Virginia".

Mr. Chas. S. May, of Swanton, spent last Sabbath with his family at this place.

Meeting of Hoyes Grange.

The Hoyes Grange met at Gap Run Thursday evening, Jan. 19, 1905, and it was very enthusiastic.

Some of the newly elected officers were installed and some points of business were attended to. It was decided and ordered that Grange Bulletins be sent to ten persons who are non-members of the Grange for a term of three months. This is done to give people a better understanding of what the Grange is for and to convince them that the society has been organized for the benefit of the agriculturists.

TO ARGUE ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Disfranchisement Case to Come Up Today at Annapolis.

NEWROADS BILL INCLUDED IN CASE

Expected That Court Of Appeals Decision Will Be Handed Down Promptly.

The mandamus case of Mr. Murray Vandiver against Governor Warfield to test the validity of the proposed Constitutional amendments to disfranchise illiterates and to empower the State to give aid to public roads will be argued before the Court of Appeals today. This arrangement, through the courtesy and sanction of Chief Judge McSherry of the Court of Appeals, has been made by the counsel on both sides as a matter of convenience.

The decision of the Court of Appeals is expected to be handed down promptly, and will be eagerly awaited by the politicians on both sides, who will then know "where they are at." Should the Court reverse the lower tribunal, and decide that the Poe amendment was not properly passed because of the lack of the Governor's approval and signature, that would be the end of the matter for the present. On the other hand, should the Court of Appeals affirm the action of the Circuit Court of Anne Arundel county, and sustain the validity of the amendment, both parties will at once begin the campaign for and against the measure. As heretofore stated, on the assumption that the court of last resort will sustain the amendment, Democratic Chairman Vandiver has already done much preliminary work toward organization. Republican Chairman Hanna is also closely watching the situation, and if necessary, will be prepared to commence an active campaign as soon as the decision of the Court of Appeals is announced.

How To Make Money.

Buy a farm in the South where you have all the advantages of a settled country, where the land is still cheap, where crops are sure and the climate is unsurpassed. A personally conducted excursion party will leave Chicago Tuesday, February 21st, for an inspection trip through the South. Join this party and see for yourself. Write today for free descriptive matter and full particulars to E. A. Richter, Pass. & Land Agent, Illinois Central R. R., No. 517 Bessemer Bldg., Pittsburg, Pa. Feb. 21.

Coal Company Elect Officers.

At a meeting of the Pittsburg and Maryland Coal Company held at the law office of Mr. E. H. Sincell on Tuesday Mr. N. U. Bond was elected president, Mr. W. E. McMillan vice-president, and Mr. E. H. Sincell secretary and treasurer for the ensuing year.

BE HONEST ABOUT IT.

Discussions now going on among Democrats, both those who keep in line with the managers and those who do not, make it very evident that Maryland will never get an honest election law until it chooses a legislature pledged to the repeal of the present statute and the substitution of a measure passed in a nonpartisan spirit. No constitutional amendment that meets with the approval of those who are determined upon carrying out any plan for disfranchisement for the purpose of making the Democratic party stronger than it is today would improve the present law, but would be sure to make it worse and to open more loopholes for fraud and trick. It must be apparent to all who have studied the subject in an unprejudiced way and who recall the experiences of the last few years, that there will never be an honest suffrage in this state until the law made at the extra session of 1901 is done away with altogether.

Democratic political clubs have now taken up the subject, and their members are listening to speeches by party men who have given it some study. Such a speech was made recently before the Concord Club by State's Attorney Owens, who favored an extra session for the drafting of a constitutional amendment with an educational qualification clause, but very different from the one made by the managers and omitting the grandfather's clause altogether. The Crescent Club, which does not usually train with those who now rule the party, has heard from one of its leading members, Mr. B. B. Shreeves, who opposes the plans of the State's Attorney and who said: "An extra session of the legislature at the present time would mean a garble and mutilated amendment to the Constitution and a blow to proper reform. A campaign of education must go on and then an aroused sentiment among the people will demand from their delegates the proper relief and this relief will be that given by friends of this reform, and not by those whose whole past has been inimical or passive in regard to these objects."

These varying opinions show how far apart Democrats are on this subject. The managers have not yet receded one inch from their position, and their future action will depend upon the Court of Appeals in the Vandiver mandamus case. Should they win they will make a fight before the people in behalf of their iniquitous amendment. Should they lose they will do their best to induce Governor Warfield to call an extra session to get the same amendment or one very similar in character before the voters next November. These managers realize that it is a fight to the death; that their power is at stake, and that under a different law they would be forced to step down and out.

Fortunate it is for Maryland that the people will have the last say in this matter. Public opinion was aroused by the discreditable showing made at the presidential election, and the determination to prevent a repetition of that disgrace will make itself felt in all parts of the state at the very first opportunity. No constitutional amendment of a partisan character will ever pass, and there will be no restriction of the suffrage which is not fair to all alike. The legislature elected next fall will be pledged to an honest law and the days of trick ballots in Maryland will be ended.—Baltimore American.

TALKING ABOUT 1903.

The Washington gossips are doing a good deal of talking about the possible Republican nomination for 1908. With Roosevelt out of the reckoning, through his own withdrawal, the race seems to be anybody's. One of the sooth sayers at the national capital says it is "Fairbanks against the field." Others mention Taft, Root and Hay as being favorites. We will hear much of this sort of talk for the next three and a half years.

Guesses, however, made at this time regarding the nomination for 1980 are particularly liable to be astray. Many things can take place between now and the meeting of the national convention which may alter the situation radically. Nobody can tell what will be the issues three and a half years hence. The Congress recently chosen may, in its two years of work, bring new questions and new men to the front. Nothing is fixed in American politics three or four years in advance. Shortly after Grant's election in 1868 it was noticed that a movement was started for his renomination in 1872. Grant's case, however, was exceptional. He received a unanimous nomination in each year.

At this moment, however, the outlook for the candidacy in 1908, with Roosevelt out of the contest, is as uncertain as that of 1888 was after Blaine, a few months before the convention, declined to allow his name to be considered in connection with the nomination. The convention of 1888 was long and exciting. It had an especially large number of aspirants. The man who led on the early ballots, John Sherman, did not get the nomination. The man who did get the candidacy, Benjamin Harrison, stood fifth on the roll on the early divisions in the convention. The chances for several days seemed to favor some of the other aspirants. It will be well for the prophets to go slow in their forecasts for the next canvass. Let us see what developments are made in 1905, 1906 and 1907 before we begin to make any calculations as to the issues or the candidates for 1908.—Parkersburg News.

The Simple Life

BY

CHARLES WAGNER

President Roosevelt Says to the Author of it :

"I AM PREACHING YOUR BOOK TO MY COUNTRYMEN." :: :: ::

Will Soon Begin as a Serial in this Paper

TO aspire to the simple life is to rightly aspire to the fulfilment of the highest human destiny. All the movements of humanity toward more justice and more light have been at the same time movements toward a more simple life. And the antique simplicity in arts, manners and ideas hold for us their incomparable value only because it has been able to give a powerful relief to some essential sentiments, to some fixed truths. We must love that simplicity and guard it piously. But he will have gone but the hundredth part of his road who holds to exterior forms, and who does not seek to realize the spirit. In fact, it is impossible for us to be simple in the same ways as were our forbears, and we can only remain so, or return to simplicity in the same spirit. We are walking in other paths, but the aim of humanity is fundamentally the same. It is always the polar star which directs the mariner, no matter whether he is embarked on a sailing ship or a steamer.

To advance towards this aim with all the means of which we can dispose is the most important thing, today as ever. And it is because we have often been drawn aside that we have confused and complicated our lives.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK

There never was so aggressive a campaign in Sunday school work as now. All the churches are taking a part in it and are seeking to reap the benefits. In the forefront of this great movement, side by side with the other churches, is the Sunday School Department of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is called the Sunday School Union, having been so christened as long ago as 1827. Strong men have been at its head since its organization in 1840. Prominent among these was that matchless worker for young people, Bishop John H. Vincent. It was during his time that he instituted the Berean System of lessons, which later developed into the International System, that is now used every Sunday by more than 13,000,000 of Sunday school people.

The head of the Sunday School Union today is Rev. John T. McFarland, D. D., who came to his present office from Topeka, Kansas—a man well fitted by scholarship and experience for his position. While having been in office scarcely six months, his work is being felt, and it is Scripture that says, "By their works ye shall know them." The Sunday School Journal, edited by him, is a magazine well suited for the family as well as the Bible student. It has a circulation of 225,000 and ought to double it at once.

All modern methods of teaching and work are being considered today by this organization, and it proposes to meet the needs of its constituency. It organizes new Sunday schools and helps the needy ones, and this work it does constantly. It is supported by the contributions of the churches of the denomination. It gave aid to about fourteen hundred last year, and will probably do more in the year to come.

When we consider that the Sunday school is not only an educator in good things, but is training the future citizenship of our land in all things pertaining to morals and godliness, it should have both the moral and financial support of the church and all right-minded people.

SOME RADICAL MEASURES

Pension Lawyers, Railroad Passes And Other Objects of Legislation.

Should the legislation proposed by Congressmen within the last few days ripen into laws, there would be some radical changes in the manner in which business is done in Washington and elsewhere.

Congressman Pearre of Maryland, wants a pension at $30 a month for "every person who served 50 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion and were honorably discharged, and who, at the date of filling his declaration hereunder, shall have arrived at the age of 70 years."

No attorneys' fees are to be allowed under the act.

Senator Nelson of Minnesota wants to prohit absolutely the engaging of foreign vessels in the coastwise trade, under penalty of a forfeiture of cargo. Neither are they to be permitted, if his ideas harden into laws, to take part ni the excursion business between ports of the United States, under penalty of $200 for each passenger carried. The bill will not apply to Alaska.

Representative Sheppard wants the Government to stop paying mileage to Congressmen who traveled on free passes. He is going to do it by adding to existing law this provision:

"That before said mileage shall be paid each Senator shall file with the President of the Senate and each Representative and Delegate shall file with the Speaker of the House a statement to the effect that he has not used a free pass or passes for transportation to each regular session, and will not use a free pass or passes in returning therefore."

Not to be outdone by the radicals, Representative Livingston of Georgia, has introduced a joint resolution which provides "That hereafter the election for electors for President and Vice-President and Representatives Congress shall be held in each State on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in September, and the Fifty-Ninth Congress shall assemble and hold its first regular session on the first Monday in October, 1905, and each succeeding Congress shall assemble and hold its first regular session on the first Monday in October succeeding its election."

Jesus and Nicodemus.

The visit of Nicodemus to Jesus ought to be viewed in the light of events then transpiring. The ruler of the Jews has been severely criticised for the clandestine character of his visit. He has been characterized as constitutionally timid (Westcott), as having softness of constitution (Olshausen), and even a dispicable time-server (Elchorn). But it should be remembered that the ever-widening breach between the officials of the Hebrew Church and the reforming rabbi had already begun. As a class they were his pronounced enemies. Nicodemus rose superior to the intense prejudice of his clique, at least to the extent of visiting the offending Teacher and inquiring into His doctrine. The wonder is not that he came at night, but that he came at all. Considering the perversity of the human heart—especially the heart of a ruler of the Jews—the action of this master in Israel is admirable.

Jesus had signalized the opening of His ministery by a series of miracles wrought in Jerusalem and at the feasting time. Most conspicuous hour and place! Nicodemus was one of many upon whom these signs had had their designed effect. He refers at once in his first polite address to the miracles as sufficient seal to the supernatural origin of Jesus' mission.

Jesus knew "what was in" His visitor, his exact status. Here was a man superior to his class, but not wholly free from their prejudices; one profoundly interested in the kingdom of God, but not yet apprehending its spiritual character. The tenor of Jesus' uttered word fits exactly into the mortise of Nicodemus thought.

The metaphor of a new birth was familiar to the Hebrew mind. They considered all proselytes to their faith as having been born again. What nonplussed Nicodemus was to be told that he could only come into the kingdom of God as the proselyte came into the Hebrew Church. He considered himself a charter member of that kingdom. Now, to find that it was not a question of a higher or a lower seat at the table, but of any seat at all—that was what dumfounded him. "He, Abraham's son, and in addition a Pharisee and ruler, and yet to be shut out with heathen 'dogs' —it was incomprehensible!"

Confusion led this master in Israel to the silliest possible rejoinder. He seeks to parry the thrust and gain time by taking literally what he knew to be a figure of speech. His questions fairly die upon his lips.

Here is a lovely example of the gentleness of Jesus. He does not break the bending reed. He amplifies His first expression. "Born again," into "born of water and the spirit." And further: "Depravity can only beget depravity, but the Spirit can beget the spiritual. So the great need of humanity is to be 'Spirit-born.' This only is the way into the kingdom of God."

This Spirit-birth is incomprehensible. But this is no insuperable objection to it; for there are a good many "earthly things" that can not be understood. The invisible, imponderable breath of nature—who knows it exhaustively? But who doubts its existence, so long as it gives its audible token? Who would refuse to avail himself of it for either his lungs or his sails because he can not know all about it?

As Rudolf Stier well says: "A hard figure had humbled to the position of learner, a master in Israel." In his very question as to the manner Nicodemus admits the fact of a new birth into the kingdom of heaven.

Well may Luther call this "the Bible in miniature" (Bibel im kleinen), and Stier describe it as "the most sublime and simple expression of the eternal mystery of redemption which the Scriptures contain."

Mosaic from Commentaries.

A man: From the people collectively, to whom Jesus had addressed Himself, a transition is now made to His dealing with an individual.—Luthardt. Pharisee, ruler: Circumstances account for prominence given incident.—New Century. Came to Jesus by night: In secret, so as not to be observed. This he could easily do, because the steps to the guest-chamber, the upper room, were on the outside of the house, as today in Palestine and often in Italy. He went by night (1) because common prudence would lead him so to do. It was not wise to commit himself till he knew more about the new Teacher. He would not launch out on an unknown voyage over an unknown sea. (2) The quiet evening hour, after the public work and teaching of Jesus were over, and the crowds had retired to their homes, was by far the best time for this purpose. (3) He would wish not to be interfered with by curious observers, but would have a heart-to-heart talk with Jesus.—Peloubet. Rabbi: Accords the dignity denied by many.—Lange. Verily, verily, I say: One of the great cardinal truths of the kingdom of heaven solemnly introduced.—Lange. Except: An answer to what was in Nicodemus's mind rather than what he actually said.—New Century. A man be born: Jesus gave Nicodemus to understand that he had not yet reached the forecourt of true knowledge. When he requires the new birth from above as the condition of seeing the kingdom. He means according to the analogy of the Jewish designation of proselytes, or born again, primarily: Except a man come out from the old system, become a proselyte, publicly commit himself to a new position. Birth from above demands a great transition. Nicodemus would privately assure Him of the adhesion of a party of the Pharisees, implying the presumption that he would attach himself to the old order of things. Jesus demands of him a proselyteism wrought by God, a coming forth from the darkness of light and of the old party, if he would have any understanding at all of the kingdom which he Himself announces.—Lange. How can a man be born again? Either Nicodemus purposely misunderstands in order to reduce Christ's words to an absurdity, or more probably not knowing what to say, he asks what he knew to be a foolish question.—Camb.—Bib.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Nicodemuses abound to-day. They are deferential and even complimentary to Jesus. But they find in him only a teaching Messiah. His Word and example are the ladder to heaven, not His cross. They understand not the imperative necessity, the incalculable advantage of "His lifting up," nor its similitude to the lifting up of the serpent by Moses. They stop short of the atonement in Christ. They lose all. They are like that saxon peasant boy Zeller tells of, who, on being asked if he learned anything of Jesus at school, replied, "O yes!" "What, then?" "That He was a good Teacher of the people." Bless me! This world has had teachers enough. What it wanted was a Savior!

Be born again: That is the first sentence of the divine catechism (Stier). The very term is, in itself, enough to inspire hope. It is an effect which, by the utmost striving, we can not produce upon ourselves. It is a gift. It is from above.

Sum and substance of the Christian religion is a principle of life in the human soul. It is not doctrine, but life. As Luther paraphrases it: My doctrine is not of doing or leaving undone, but of being and becoming; so that it is not a new work to be done, but just the being new-created. Or, again, with Draseke: The kingdom of God is nothing into which a man can think, or study, or read, or hear, or talk, or discuss himself; a man can only experience his way into the kingdom of God. Or with Stier: Thou wouldst begin at the Omega. I will begin at the Alpha, and thus teach thee the whole alphabet of My doctrine in that one word, "born again!"

If we only availed ourselves of what we understood, we could not live a day longer in this world. A college professor at an amateur club expounded the principles of the application of electricity to locomotion. He was technical and used algebraic equations on the blackboard. At the very first one was: "Well, but professor, what does make the car go?" The scientist turned to put the quotation on the board again, while his elderly interlocutor sank back in her chair disconsolately. She may never know what makes the car go, but she will never decline to ride upon it on that account. Shall we show less common sense concerning the car of salvation?

The effects of the new birth are apparent, incontestable, glorious eternal. Though we may never know just how the tree grows, may its fruits be in us and abound! They will, if we stop to decipher it all out. Faith is the only means of demonstration.

A LONG WAIT FOR DEMOCRATS.

Chairman Taggart makes it very clear that the nation is dissatisfied with the Democratic party and its policies, and that the tremendous defeat of last November was the deliberate voice of the people. While that is nothing new, it is of some interest when coming from Mr. Taggart.

In his recent speech at Lafayette, Ind., Mr. Taggart said that he was the real chairman of the National Committee; that the Executive Committee was created with his full approval, and that he was loyally supported by Sheehan, Nicoll, Belmont and all others in the committee, and that everything possible was done with the "ample means" at the disposal of the committee to win success. Yet with an "irreproachable" candidate, the party "encountered a reverse almost unparalleled."

Mr. Taggart added that he did not believe "any other candidate on any platform could have been elected."

He was right in that conclusion. Ex-Judge Parker would have been a little stronger if he had said less. The more he talked the more harm he did for himself. But no man the party could have named for President would have been elected.

A party that avowed itself in opposition to protection and in favor of scuttling from the Philippines and for other such unpatriotic policies could not appeal successful to the American people, to say nothing of the record the Democrats have made. But what of the future? Neither Bryan nor Taggart could hold out any hope, excepting from the Micawber-like policy of "waiting for something to turn up."

HER GREAT CATCH

By MARTHA McCULLOCH-WILLIAMS

Copyright, 1904, by Martha McCulloch-Williams

"You can stay for the preacher if you like. I'm going fishing," Alicia said, stabbing the spring air viciously with her rod.

It was a long reed, cut from the canebrakes down on the river, innocent of reel and equipped with a home-made line, a cork float and bullet sinkers above the cheap hook. Her frock, a clean but faded calico, was short enough to show stout leather shoes, with a glimpse of home knit stockings above. But none of these things dimmed sparkling eyes or paled the wild rose flush in delicately molded cheeks. Alicia was a beauty quite independent of clothes. Her dearest friends admitted it. Susan Kates, to whom she had spoken, was pretty in a way, but largely by the help of artifice.

Susan was also pious, just the girl for a preacher's wife, all Brush Creek neighborhood declared; hence when it was known that the new Methodist minister was a bachelor and something of a beau the amen corner sisters all agreed that it was a clear case of providential interference. Susan herself shared their opinion, albeit she was too wise to say so. She had come the day before to spend a week with Alicia, although the Blair homestead was but three miles from her father's farm.

Madam Blair, Alicia's grandmother and guardian, was the leading spirit in Methodism thereabout. As such she had sent word to the Rev. Paul Redford to make her house his home "until he could suit himself better."

The invitation made gossip, of course. Madam was a keen one. She meant to marry off that flighty Alicia. The new preacher would be sacrificed to her before he fairly knew it. Didn't somebody say he had been to college and was, moreover, pretty well off? Madam Blair had an eye to the main chance, the same as the ungodly. She had broken up the affair between Alicia and that scatter brained young Clarkson with a mighty high hand. Clarkson was poor and likely to stay so. But, then, Alicia would have plenty for two.

"BETTER NOT," A MAN'S VOICE SAID A LITTLE WAY OFF.

Usually new ministers came in the fall. Paul Redmond was a "supply," taking the place of the regular itinerant, who had fallen ill. The makeshift parsonage had been rented out, and the supply minister might have boarded around all over the circuit but for Madam Blair. Alicia was angered by her grandmother's interference.

She had not been very much in love with Billy Clarkson until Grandmother Blair had come between them. She was not in love with the real Billy even now, but cherished passionately an ideal she called by Billy's name. Naturally she resented Redmond and all his works. Quite as naturally she had inveigled the coy yet willing Susan into this long visit, with a set purpose of flinging the pair at each other's head and if possible compassing an engagement before a fortnight passed.

"I don't think it looks respectful—to the gospel nor—nor anything," Susan said primly, sitting down upon the upper step of the porch. Alicia laughed—so grimly it showed she was a Blair all through. "Then you stay here and be respectful—to the gospel—for both of us," she said with her chin high, whistling the next minute to Flossy, her pet shepherd dog, and swinging down the path to the back gate.

The creek was less than half a mile away, with Blair fields on either side of it. Alicia knew all the bends and ripples of it and loved them as well as she knew them. She meant to fish first the Blue hole, which lay just inside the upper water gate, going thence downstream and ending at the lower gate so as to go home by the big road.

Only a blind track ran past the upper gate. Stragglers never found it out, not even the most inveterate fishermen who might be lured by this exceptional morning, with water in just the right stage. Something in the day made Alicia want to sing. She did not do it, being firmly of opinion that fish have ears and are mighty wary of human sounds. And today she was bent on catching the patriarch of the pool, a big trout, known to inhabit it these three years or more, which quite disdained to notice the most artistic flies of the gentlemen sportsmen or their liveliest minnows. His special haunt was beneath the roots of the big bending sycamore which leaned far out over the stream. Without a tremor she climbed into the tree's low crotch by a pathway of loosely laid rails, established herself as comfortably as possible and dropped her hook right in front of the big fellow's nose.

She could not see him—the water was just delicately turbid from rains two days back—but she felt him nibble a bit, then saw the water swirl as with an upward rush. Presently she saw him leap half out of the water ten yards away. She drew in her hook, to find half the bait bitten off, and as she put on fresh worms she said, with a smiling nod: "Old man, Sukey ought to have come along. She could have got points on how to hook and land the preacher."

She was too intent on sport to hear a little stifled laugh. Indeed, she had no consciousness of anything just then but the matter in hand. She had cast a little way from where the trout broke. For perhaps two minutes the float lay aggravatingly expressionless, simply drifting a bit in the eddy of the pool; then it went under with a rush, to come up two yards away and go down again almost instantly. The trout, bold from long impunity, had swallowed the hook.

Alicia did not try to haul him in at once. Instead she let him play up stream and down, taking in the slack with bare hands and letting it go back with a rush that must have bewildered her captive. After a ten minutes' fight she hauled in her quarry, two pounds of gleaming silver, and, holding him fast, made to scramble down to the bank.

Dismay smote her as she turned about. The rails had slipped down. She was fairly entrapped. The tree crotch overhung the water, which was, she knew, well over her head. Although she could swim a little, she did not like to risk a plunge. Yet there seemed no alternative. The landward side of the big trunk was not to be reached from where she sat. She made an impatient little swing of her catch, saying: "There, you'll get back in the water after all and take me with you. I think I'll tie you to me and make you swim out."

"Better not," a man's voice said a little way off. "I don't believe he would swim out. He'd rather keep you down at the bottom."

"Then come and take me down," Alicia said disdainfully, angry beyond words that anything masculine could thus calmly contemplate her plight instead of flying to the rescue. She heard long, firm steps approaching. By craning her neck severely she saw a man, young, handsome, well set up, evidently an athlete, and fashionably dressed. "So you are Alicia Blair, my hostess in part."

"And how came you here when you are looked for at the house?" Alicia demanded severely.

Paul Redmond laughed. "Because I had rather be here," he retorted. "My traps have gone on houseward to announce me, but I heard so much of that 'tomboy granddaughter' on the way from town, when my guide, Deacon Estis, who fetched me by the short cut to show me—well, several things—said 'that she is, right now, a-feeshin',' I simply had to come and see for myself."

"How long since?" Alicia asked, her face scarlet. Redmond laughed again. "The point is—immaterial," he said. "Just now the burning question is, 'How shall I get down?'"

"That's easy. Put up the rails and go away," Alicia said.

Redmond shook his head. "I can't trust you. The rails might slip," he said. "I know a better way, but first fling me your fish."

Obediently Alicia swung him her gasping prize. He at once slipped a limber pronged twig through its gills and anchored it comfortably in the stream, saying: "Let the example bear fruit, Miss Alicia. Don't give any of your later captives needless agony."

"You don't seem to care about me. I'm very uncomfortable," Alicia said with spirit. "If you won't put up the rails, at least go away. The water is deep—still"—

"You are not going into it," Redmond said quickly, stepping upon the leaning trunk and clinging fast to it with one arm. He held the other out toward her, saying with a twinkle: "One, two, three! Here we go! Jump! I'll catch you right as a trivet."

"I won't jump," Alicia said with her grandest air.

Redmond looked at her severely. "You will jump," he repeated, "and right straight off! It's going to rain like fun in about twenty minutes, and unless you take me to the house I shall get very wet."

"I think you are—despicable," Alicia pouted. But as he looked at her, smiling more roguishly than ever, she gave a spring, was caught and swung safe to the bank. There Redmond said to her, her eyes fairly dancing: "I don't know Sukey, but really she should have come along. She would certainly have got points on—landing a minister."

Which proved to be prophetic. Six months later Alicia Blair was Alicia Redmond, and not only resigned to the change, but happy over it.

Lost His Head.

One of Philadelphia's well known literary men has just come back from England. He is looking very well, and one of his friends complimented him on it. "You're getting fat, old man. Never saw you looking better."

"Well, no. Fact is, I'm really thinner. I've lost fourteen pounds."

"H'm! Yes? What did you lose it on—the Derby?"—Lippincott's Magazine.

Bowser Would Farm

He Sees Dazzling Visions of Wealth In Chickens, Eggs and a Dairy—Gives Figures Showing Great Profits, but Forgets Expense, Which Mrs. B. Itemizes.

[Copyright, 1904, by T. C. McClure.]

MRS. BOWSER had been prepared for it for over an hour when it came at last. Mr. Bowser's demeanor had told her that he had a new scheme on foot, and she had patiently waited for him to broach it. He had been hitching around in a nervous way as he tried to read the evening paper, and he finally laid the sheet aside and said:

"I'd like to talk with you for a few minutes about a matter concerning our future."

"Very well," she replied.

"You know that I have often expressed a wish to get out on a farm."

"You are no farmer and would starve on the best farm in the country."

"I don't claim to be a farmer, but a man who isn't a farmer can make a living in the country, can't he? I don't propose to go to tearing stumps up by the roots and mowing five acres of hay per day."

"WE START WITH FIVE HUNDRED CHICKENS."

"No? Well, what is the scheme?"

"If we could exchange this house for a hundred acre farm I'd go into the chicken and egg business, with perhaps a bit of a dairy as a side issue. I know we went over this ground once, but you got your figures all wrong and deceived me."

"Well, we'll go over it again. Let me get a pencil. What has put the notion into your head again?"

"There's money in it—big money—and I can prove it. Now, then, figure carefully and don't be in a hurry. We start with 500 chickens."

"Yes."

"The natural increase of domestic fowls is 30 per cent, but with an incubator we make it 50. We gain 250 fowls the first year. On the second year we have over 1,000 and sell at least 200. On the third year we have 1,300 and sell at least 500. That disposes of the chickens."

"Yes—go on," replied Mrs. Bowser.

"We now take up the egg question. The 500 chickens we start with ought to produce 200 eggs per day the first year. That is a total of 73,000 eggs per year and at 20 cents per dozen gives us a cash income of $3,650. The second year the income is $5,000, and the third $8,000, making over $16,000 for three years. We will estimate the sales of broilers, roosters and old hens for the three years at $1,560, or a total of $18,000. Do you know of any little business in the city, Mrs. Bowser, to beat that?"

"Go on," she said, without the faintest shadow of a smile showing on her face. "Anything else?"

"I may raise a couple of acres of celery each year. I have figures to show that the profit is at least $3,000 per acre."

"Well?"

"And if we got the right kind of ground why not devote an acre or so to peppermint? It is one of the best paying small crops a man can go into."

"Is that all?"

"It's about all, only I had forgotten the other fowls. While raising chickens we might as well go into ducks, geese and turkeys. The cost would be nothing, as they would live on what the chickens left over. We can put the profit on them down at $1,000 a year. I have gone over the whole thing several times, and I figure out that we must make at least $10,000 a year for the first three years. After that the income will be considerably greater."

"But about the dairy?" she asked.

"Why, I figured that we'd start in with about a dozen cows. The milk, butter and cream ought to bring in a profit of at least a thousand dollars a year. We get all this, Mrs. Bowser, while we are getting the pure air and sunshine of the country at the same time. I am also getting back my health. Every day is full of happiness and health, and all we have to do is to sit on the veranda and listen to the hum of the bees and the songs of the robins. That's my side of it, and if you have anything to say let's hear it. Understand, we exchange our house and lot even up for a farm."

"We will take it in rotation?" replied Mrs. Bowser as a feeling of pity crept into her heart. "You are to start with 500 chickens?"

"Yes—500."

"Well, even if you can buy them for 25 cents apiece, which I very much doubt, there is an outlay of $125 to start with. Had you figured on that?"

"N-o."

"Then they must be fed until you can raise corn and oats, and you can add another $50 for that. There will be the cost of your buildings and your incubator. To run an incubator and 500 chickens you must have the help of at least one man."

"You are beginning to find fault!" protested Mr. Bowser as his face began to redden.

"Not at all. We are just jotting down some figures to see how we would come out. To run a hundred-acre farm you must have a hired man and at least one span of horses. No flock of hens will produce the number of eggs you figure on, nor yet half of it. You have made no allowance for deaths by diseases. We must cut your figures in half."

"By thunder, but what a fool I was to say a word to you about it!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he got up and walked about. "What do you know about business? What does any woman?"

"About your bees?" she continued, without minding him. "You start with twenty hives. They will cost you $4 a hive. You don't understand bees, and you must employ somebody who does. You think of going into celery. The ground must be prepared and the seed or the plants purchased. To grow and market an acre of celery you must have the services of another man. If you go into peppermint it's the same thing—money in advance and extra help. Don't imagine for a moment that ducks, geese and turkeys can live on what the chickens leave over. Every three fowls will eat as much food as a horse."

"Make me out the biggest fool in America!" he shouted at her from across the room.

"Now, as to the side issue dairy. You start with twelve cows, and they will cost you at least $35 each. You must build stables for them, buy feed for at least seven months, and you must have extra help again. Had you figured on that? To sum up, we can estimate that to establish such a farm as you have in mind your outlay of cash the first year would be nothing short of $3,000, and from that on you must pay at least five hands. Cut it, risks and work like a slave yourself. I don't want to discourage you, Mr. Bowser, but"—

"Stop right there, woman!" he broke in.

"What for?"

"Because I don't propose to be made out a chump and a fool and a dunderhead in my own house! I am going out. When you get ready you can go to bed."

Mr. Bowser left the house, with a vigorous slam of the front door behind him, and five minutes later was talking with his family butcher, who had once been a farmer. He hadn't got his case half stated when the butcher patted him on the shoulder and said:

"Cut it out, Bowser, and be guided by your wife's advice. Why, man, you don't know enough to run an onion bed!"

He was called a liar, and other hot words followed, but at midnight Mrs. Bowser woke up to find Mr. Bowser in bed with a peaceful look on his face.

RUSSIA'S OUTLOOK.

Russia's outlook is not very attractive at this juncture and it appears that the strong hand needed to control the situation is not in the royal family. The Czar is willing, but weak. He is without personal initative and lacks the overmastering courage and force to save his kingdom from a terrifying period of bloodshed and suffering. The people of Russia have tasted death and are stirred to such depths that history is about to record another victory of the downtrodden over their oppressors. It is inevitable that millions of people will secure and maintain their rights in spite of the crushing heel of tyranny. While the Czar is not personally a tyrant, and is inclined to grant justice to the people of Russia, yet his training and environment blinds him to the essential justice of the people's needs and to the frightful despotism exercised in his name by the aristocracy, the members of which after all are the true rulers of the great empire, and who fatten on the toil of the starving people. It is necessary for them to hold inviolate the present order of things, because with its end the end of their debauchery, their privileges and their power will have come.

When the present storm has subsided along with these aristocrats, the Grand Dukes, the Counts and other titled noblemen, many persons practically blameless, will be swept into everlasting silence. Tears and weeping will be heard throughout the land and vain regrets will echo throughout the vast domain. But a new order of things will exist. It is always thus when merciless, cold-blooded greed stands in the way of the right of the people to live, to prosper and to be happy.

Surprised Friends.

HON. GEORGE A. PEARRE FELL ON FLOOR OF HOUSE

Representative of the Sixth District Taken Suddenly Ill While Attending to Duties.

IN THE HOUSE MONDAY MORNING.

Was Able to Walk to Carriage After Being Revived—Is at His Washington Residence—Attack Attributed to Stomach Affection.

The many friends of Col. George A. Pearre, Congressman from this District will be pained to learn of that gentleman's illness who was stricken on Monday morning while in the discharge of his duties on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Details of his illness are contained in a telegram dated at Washington Monday as follows:

"At twenty minutes after 12 o'clock today, just as the House was settling down to consideration of a number of minor District matters, a sensational incident occurred that for a time threw the House into confusion and created great excitement in the galleries. Just at the moment named while the House was particularly quiet, Representative Pearre of Maryland suddenly started to his feet and fell forward on his desk, gasping convulsively for breath and beating the air with his clenched hands. Several representatives near the desk of the stricken member jumped to their feet and began to cry for a doctor and Speaker Cannon taking in the situation at a glance banged the desk with his gavel and demanded to know if there was a physician on the floor. Representative Godfrey Hunter of Kentucky was the only member on the floor who had a knowledge of medicine, and he hurried to the side of the supposedly dying man. Mr. Pearre was carried from the chamber by several of his colleagues and placed on a leather-covered sofa in the Republican cloak rooms, while Speaker Cannon announced a recess for a quarter of an hour and insisted that the members keep their seats.

"Dr. Hunter and several representatives who volunteered as nurse worked over Mr. Pearre for some time. Finally he improved somewhat, and it was learned that he had suffered a nervous collapse. Mr. Pearre had not been in good health for some time, and has been particularly ailing since the holiday recess.

"After being attended by Dr. Hunter for more than an hour Mr. Pearre recovered sufficiently to be sent to his home. Dr. Hunter said that Mr. Pearre had suffered some sort of a nervous attack indicating acute kidney trouble and that Mr. Pearre needed immediate and continued attention.

Word has been received here by friends of Col. Pearre that he had rallied quickly from the effects of the attack. He was able to walk to his carriage and was driven to his hotel. It is thought that the trouble was only of a temporary nature, due, it is believed to a minor stomach affection. Col. Pearre, of late, has grown very stout and this has tended to produce ill effects, especially since he is unable to take proper exercise.

FUTURE OF THE C. AND O. CANAL.

Rumors Regarding Its Use in the Future.

The future of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal is a subject now occupying the attention of the railroad world, says a Baltimore dispatch to the Washington Evening Star. Since the acquisition of the State of Maryland's interest in the waterway by the Western Maryland Railroad, many rumors have been afloat regarding the use to which the Wabash interests may put this ownership.

It will be remembered that the West Virginia Central and Pittsburg Railway Company at one time made a strong effort to buy the canal, but it was blocked by the Baltimore and Ohio, which, having purchased all of the $500,000 bonds of 1878 and a large portion of the bonds of 1844, intervened and obtained possession through the trustees of the bonds of 1844, and under a decision of the Court of Appeals have possession until January 1, 1906. These trustees were John K. Cowen (now deceased), Hugh L. Bond, second vice-president of the Baltimore and Ohio, and Mr. Joseph Bryan, of Richmond. The property is now in possession of the surviving trustees and is virtually controlled by the Baltimore and Ohio.

While the Western Maryland owns the canal subject to the mortgage of 1844 and 1878, it cannot, under present conditions, force a sale of its interests and claims until January 1 next.

This condition therefore will hamper the Western Maryland Railroad in any plans, which may be in contemplation, but it is possible that this receivership, for that is what the trusteeship amounts to, may be lifted by agreement before the time set by the courts, and if such should result, then interesting developments may be expected.

One report has it that the canal may be divided between the Baltimore and Ohio and the Western Maryland—the former railroad to take charge of that portion from Georgetown, D. C., to Hancock, and the Western Maryland to take that section between Cumberland and Hancock.

The fact must not be lost sight of that possession of the canal gives the Wabash entrance into Washington, providing a direct line from the West to the nation's capital, and it is among the possibilities that such a road may be constructed from Hancock to Georgetown as an outlet to Washington of the large passenger traffic of the Wabash. Terminal facilities in the national capital are assured under the terms of the act of Congress providing for the construction of the union station, which gives to all railroads now and hereafter entering Washington the right of trackage and of station.

However, it is far more likely that an agreement will be reached whereby the Baltimore and Ohio will handle the passenger traffic of the Wabash from Hancock or Cherry Run to Washington, while the Western Maryland will be the outlet of the Baltimore and Ohio to central Pennsylvania cities and towns and be the connecting link between the Baltimore and Ohio and the Reading systems.

The settlement out of court last week of the Baltimore and Ohio-Western Maryland freight diversion case provided for re-establishment of the relations which existed before the institution of the now famous suit, and this is regarded in railroad circles here as an indication that the Gould-Cassatt war in drawing to an end, or that a truce at least has been declared.

DEATH OF MRS. ISON.

Expired Yesterday at the Home of Her Son In Washington.

A telegram to THE REPUBLICAN from Washington yesterday afternoon conveyed the intelligence of the death of Mrs. Ison, widow of the late Dr. Benj. Ison and mother of Willey O. and H. Allen Ison, formerly of Oakland but for many years past employes of the Government at Washington, where they resided.

The telegram contained no details of the death of this most estimable lady, but from another source we have learned that during Mrs. Ison's visit to the St. Louis exposition she contracted a heavy cold but had almost entirely recovered from its effects. A letter was received here on Monday by a friend of the family which stated that Mrs. Ison was enjoying excellent health, aside from the effects of the cold above referred to.

Mrs. Ison died at the home of her eldest son with whom she has been making her home this winter.

The remains of the deceased will be brought to Oakland and buried from St. Paul's M. E. church Friday afternoon at 1:30 o'clock p. m.

The many friends and acquaintances of this christian lady will be pained to learn of her sudden and unexpected death.

Mr. Fred. A. Thayer, assignee of mortgage, will sell at public auction in front of the court house in Oakland on Saturday, February 25th, a parcel of ten acres of land lying a short distance southwest of Oakland on the Crellin road. The land is very desirable for anyone desiring to engage in trucking and poultry raising.

Misses Lizzie and Allie Hart went to Baltimore Monday morning where they expect to remain until Sunday when they will accompany their sister Miss Mamie home. The latter has been in a hospital in that city several weeks where she underwent a severe operation and is just recovering from the effects of the same.

A sleighing party composed of seven couples of married folks from Oakland went down to Mr. G. W. Delawder's place near McHenry Tuesday afternoon for supper. On the return they were caught in the wind and snow storm which swept over this section that evening and many hardships were experienced before home was finally reached. The wind was blowing a gale which carried the snow into the road closing it and obliterating all traces of the thoroughfare. With the thermometer below the zero mark and a number of the party having made no provision for such a drop in the temperature the cold was doubly felt.

MR. L. T. YODER LOSES BY FIRE.

Large Stable Belonging to that Gentleman Burned at Pittsburg.

Mr. L. T. Yoder, of Pittsburg, sends the following clipping from a Pittsburg paper of the 19th inst., giving an account of a fire which destroyed a large stable and other property belonging to him:

"The large two-story frame stable in the rear of the residence of L. T. Yoder, of Murray Hill avenue, near Wilkins avenue, was destroyed by fire this morning, causing a loss of $3,500. The loss is covered partially by insurance. The second floor of the stable was occupied by the coachman of the Yoder family and the fire is said to have started from a grate due to an increase in the gas pressure. An alarm was turned in from Box No. 821 at 10:50 this morning. The building was entirely in flames by the time the engine company reached the fire.

"The three horse were taken from the stable, but two carriages were burned and also much hay and feed. The stable was burned to the ground."

For Sale—Tread Power.

Can use one, two or three horses, suitable for grinding corn on cob, sawing wood, shredding fodder, chopping hay or straw—in fact anything power may be attached to. The machine is almost new, in thorough repair and will be sold at a bargain. Farm work requiring use of horses operating it and the installation of a gas engine to take its place is our reason for offering it for sale.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there has come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hogs and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK FOR 1905

Messrs. J. M. Davis & Sons, of Oakland, Review the Past and Take a Rosy View of the Future.

Another year has come and gone with all its trials, disappointments and pleasures. Business men and are through their with invoices, balances are struck, and 1904 goes down in history as a success or a failure.

In this, our home town and county, we feel sure all have reasons to be thankful. Throughout the whole year we were blessed with everything that goes to make home happy and life worth living. Never in the history of our county were there such large crops raised by the farmer, and sold at better prices than during the past year, and improvements of all kinds were never more extensively made. One could not help but be impressed in passing through the town and county at the number of new houses, barns and general improvements.

Speaking in a general way we are in a prosperous condition and 1904 has shown up a balance on the right side. So with faith in our town, county and people, we have every reason to look upon the year 1905 with great favor, believing if we push ahead as in the past, we can all attain to greater success.

We have just return from our annual business trip from visiting the leading factories and large jobbing houses along the line of goods that are sold by us, placing larger orders and making more extensive contracts than ever before. In some cases the goods are manufactured for our special trade under our own name.

One is impressed with the number of improvements manufacturers are constantly making. Never before in the history of our country do the people enjoy more of the conveniences than at the present time. With the improved machinery goods are manufactured on such a large scale that the work of one man is equal to ten of a few years ago, thus making the goods better and cheaper, placing many of the leading goods and conveniences in the reach of all classes of people.

This is clearly demonstrated by the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Field Fencing. A few years ago a good substantial fencing for farm use was unknown, but modern improvements brought forward all kinds and styles, the latest of which is the Electric Welded as made by the Pittsburg Steel Co. So far as we have been able to judge this fence is the strongest and most durable fence made.

They have just finished one of the largest and most complete factories ever built and the only one to manufacture a fence by welding the wires together. Their success has been so great that today they are making a fence at one-half the price of a few years ago, and much better, thus helping the farmer and consumer. At no time has the factory been able to supply the demand, although they have a capacity of fifty thousand rods daily, shipping out thousands of cars throughout the whole country, clear through to California.

The same thing is true in many other lines. While on our trip we had the pleasure of visiting a number of china factories, one especially that covers 40 acres of floor space. Here you will find buyers from all parts of the country, placing orders for car after car to be shipped throughout all our Western country. You would naturally think that the market would be over-stocked, but this is not the case. Nearly all the leading factories are behind in filling orders and are looking for this year to be one of the most prosperous in the history of our country, so we feel with the present outlook we are warranted in placing our orders and contracts for the year in excess of the past, believing that in our town, county and State, we have as many advantages, pleasures and prospects to be thankful for as are found in our larger towns and cities.

J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

S. L. Townshend & Son.

Mr. Arthur Townshend, who has been associated with S. L. Townshend & Son for the past 20 years, has retired from the firm.

We invite you to call and would be pleased to have your orders.

Yours truly,
MRS. S. L. TOWNSHEND.

Oakland, Md., Jan. 25, 1905. 48-4t

COUNTY STORM SWEPT.

Mercury Hovering Around the Zero Mark and Wind Blowiug a Gale.

Tuesday night the weather experienced a decided and sudden change to colder which has been growing in intensity ever since. The wind has been blowing a gale and this morning roads leading to the country are all but impassable. The thermometer this morning registered five below zero. All householders have been prepared for just such weather and therefore no suffering has been experienced by citizens of town or country so far as learned.

The Simple Life

BY

CHARLES WAGNER

President Roosevelt Says to the Author of it:

"I AM PREACHING YOUR BOOK TO MY COUNTRYMEN." :: :: ::

Will Soon Begin as a Serial in this Paper

TO aspire to the simple life is to rightly aspire to the fulfilment of the highest human destiny. All the movements of humanity toward more justice and more light have been at the same time movements toward a more simple life. And the antique simplicity in arts, manners and ideas hold for us their incomparable value only because it has been able to give a powerful relief to some essential sentiments, to some fixed truths. We must love that simplicity and guard it piously. But he will have gone but the hundredth part of his road who holds to exterior forms, and who does not seek to realize the spirit. In fact, it is impossible for us to be simple in the same ways as were our forbears, and we can only remain so, or return to simplicity in the same spirit. We are walking in other paths, but the aim of humanity is fundamentally the same. It is always the polar star which directs the mariner, no matter whether he is embarked on a sailing ship or a steamer.

To advance towards this aim with all the means of which we can dispose is the most important thing, today as ever. And it is because we have often been drawn aside that we have confused and complicated our lives.

The Twin Brothers

By ZOE ANDERSON NORRIS

May 25, After Supper.

DEAREST—I like this place you have sent me to. It is lovely, but it does seem a shame for me to be spending the summer in the country with the birds and flowers, with you there in New York working away so hard to support us.

I know what you said. You would rather work in New York than idle anywhere else. But that was only your sweetness.

I remember the joke you got off, too, when I said I believed one grew more contented with one's lot in the country, and you said you thought you would if it were a lot in a cemetery.

Then how you wrote it up and sold it for $2.

We might make our expenses, mightn't we, if only we could think up enough jokes? But the trouble with jokes is they are no good unless they are spontaneous—that is, not much.

If you would only let me help you, but you won't. I shall never forget the time I made the shirt waist for your friend. It is the only thing I can do—sew. How you took her to the theater, to a supper afterward and gave her your prettiest piece of bric-a-brac, so that altogether it amounted to about four times as much as she paid me for making the waist. You hated so to be under obligations.

I can't help you in that way evidently. As a matter of fact, I have thought it all out and concluded that the only thing for me to do is to marry. That is plain, it seems to me, as the nose on your face.

The whippoorwills sing mighty mournfully sometimes in the country. They are singing now. Good night, dear. Your loving MABEL.

May 30, After Supper.

Little Momsey—There is the dearest girl here you ever saw. She has been here all winter. I don't know why, but I think it is because she has no home. Her mother is dead.

I don't know what I should do if you were dead, momsey.

Guess what this little girl has done. Caught a beau. Yes, way out here in the country. A splendid farmer who owns a big farm not far from here.

She is sweet, but a plain little thing. She hasn't half the good looks that this chicken has inherited from somebody I know. No thanks for that. So maybe there is a chance yet for yours truly.

MABEL.

May 30, Same Old Time.

Dearest—They all go to bed at 8. Accordingly there is nothing to do but read or write, so I write. The girl, Delia, has told me all about it. She is going to be married soon. She asked me to go to Middletown with her to buy her wedding dress. I went. It was fun. Her sweetheart sent his run-about for us. We rolled along the country road—it was awfully sweet, with flowers on either side—chirping like two magpies, telling each other everything we knew.

She told me about her sweetheart. He has a twin brother. They are so alike, she says, you can't tell them apart. Funny, isn't it? And they have grown to be too large to wear blue and pink ribbons on their wrists, like the twins you see in baby carriages.

It was very interesting. One day, she said, Tom—that is the one she isn't engaged to—came to see her and sat with his arm around her waist the longest time out on the veranda—you can do that in the country where nobody passes along—sat there until Dick—the one she is engaged to—came up the steps and stared at them and rousted his brother out and took his place. Wasn't that queer? She said she believed all the time Tom knew in his heart that he was Tom and not Dick. She wondered why he did it.

Well, anyway, we bought the prettiest white silk mull dress you ever saw for her church wedding—it is to be very private—and I am going to help her make it. Wouldn't you?

I think, dearest, if you have no objection, I shall make a dead set to that "I AM SORRY I DISTURBED YOU."

other twin, Tom. He has another farm that matches his brother's somewhere about. A large, fine farm in New York state! Think of that! It's not to be sneezed at, is it? At least, that is the opinion of your devoted MABEL.

June 5.

Momsey—A queer thing has happened. I was tired. We had been sewing all day on the wedding dress, Delia and I, and I had stretched myself out in the hammock on the veranda to rest.

I hadn't been there half an hour and had fallen asleep when I was awakened by a touch of something on my cheek. I started up and confronted Tom, who had been there watching me for I don't know how long. I wonder if I snore. Do I, dearest?

He said, "I am sorry I disturbed you." But, looking at the long peacock feather with which he had touched my cheek, I was inclined to be slightly incredulous.

"I don't believe you," I returned. "What did you wake me for? I was having such a nice nap."

"I wanted to talk to you," said he.

With that he sat down by me in the hammock—I had sat straight up when he wakened me—and pushed it for me with his foot.

We had grown to be rather friendly in the past few days in between the making of the dress. I was laughing and talking with him and joking when Delia came up the walk with Dick.

He was bending over her.

"How fond they are of each other!" I said to Tom half jealously. Then I looked up and found Tom's eyes on me with an expression in them that made me blush.

These country farmers are very susceptible. It doesn't take long.

By now Delia stood on the veranda directly in front of us. She was gazing at Tom with a puzzled look.

Then she turned to Dick.

"I am getting all mixed up on the neckties," she said. "Did you change yours, Dick? I thought when you came you had on a blue one, and now it is black."

Dick laughed.

"Silly!" he cried. "It was your lively imagination."

Do you know, I don't get lonely at all now, dearest, when I hear the whippoorwills. I am beginning to love them. Isn't it strange how you get used to things in this strange old world? Good night, my little mater. Your loving MABEL.

June 10, at 10 o'Clock.

Dearest—I am writing you the hour to show how we have improved in the matter of staying up. The twins have just gone.

The wedding dress is finished. It is beautiful. I shirred the yoke. Shirring is going to be so fashionable this summer, you know. Then I am very nimble with my needle when it comes to doing little fine things like that. It is a merciful thing that I am nimble at something, isn't it, love?

I am not an adept at telling twins apart, I can tell you that. I never know Dick from Tom, though Tom is making violent love to me, and Dick is hovering over his bride elect with all the fervor that could possibly be expected of him.

Then Dick says he is Dick, and Tom says he is Tom, and you've got to take their word for it. That's all there is to it. Except for that and, as I say, their manner toward us I could never tell t'other from which.

At first we could tell by their neckties, but they have taken to wearing the same color. So there you are!

What do you think of marrying a man who is so exactly like another man? Not that he has asked me yet—that is, he has asked me in so many words—but what do you think?

Answer at once, dear. Your affectionate MABEL.

P. S.—I haven't told you for a long, long time how much I love you. I do love you.

June 30, at 12.

Dearest—You will never believe what has happened. I can hardly believe it myself.

First, the wedding came off with great eclat—that's what they call it in the papers, isn't it?—and Delia was a dream in her little white dress we had made her. I had on my dress you gave me and looked pretty fair, considering. We had beautiful flowers, and the twins were magnificent.

You couldn't tell which was which, as usual, until Dick stood with Delia at the altar, then walked out with her to the tune of the wedding march. And that left Tom with me.

We drove, all four of us, to the home of the bride, and Tom and I concluded to walk back again through the hedges and byways, listening to the whippoorwills and those other birds that fill the country night with so much melody.

We were quiet awhile, thinking over the wedding, for weddings are solemn things, dearest. They are so uncertain. You never know whether they are to blossom into happiness or divorce. But by and by Tom began to talk.

I had been listening to a bird that was singing somewhere in the wood, but at the first few words I forgot the bird and listened to him.

"I am not Tom," was what he said. "I am Dick."

How would you have taken that, dearest? Wouldn't it have given you something of a jar?

It did me.

"I thought I loved Delia," he went on, "until I saw you. But Tom—he has always loved Delia. It broke his heart when I asked her to marry me. I thought he'd never get over it. Then when you came and he saw how I began to care for you he begged me to let him have Delia.

"'She shall never know,' he said. 'You remember that time I sat on the veranda with my arm around her and she thought I was you? Well, she shall think it is you till the end of time. She shall never know.'

"What could I do," he burst out, "loving you, but to let him have her? Was it unfair to her? I think not; I am sure not. Not half so unfair as to marry her, loving you. What else could I do?"

Dearest, can you think of more than one answer to a question like this?

I couldn't.

And I shall have a big fine house, with a room in it for my little momsey whenever she wants to come to visit me.

However, I think that after our marriage I shall have Dick tattooed just a little on the wrist with a bird or a flower so I can tell him from Tom, if I don't have it done before. M[illegible]

The Power of a Coin.

How that baby did cry! Its triple expansion lung power was altogether too much for its tired looking mother, who strove in vain to keep it quiet. Sentiment in the crowded car was divided between sympathy and annoyance. It was in the heart of the shopping district, and the passengers were mostly women who usually have little sympathy for babies exhibited in public other than their own. Two stylishly dressed women got aboard bearing flowers and packages that indicated costly purchases. They couldn't even become strap hangers. They stood directly in front of the howling baby.

"Poor little thing!" said one. "Tired to death, I suppose. So am I. For a good cry like that right here this minute I would cheerfully give $10."

Opening her purse, she took out a fifty cent piece and gave it to the baby. "Get in a few extra screams for me, little one!" she said.

The baby promptly put the coin in its mouth and stopped crying. The passengers looked relieved. The woman who gave it the coin looked alarmed.

"Ach, dot makes no differences," said the grateful mother. "Ven he gries at home I gives him a spoon to put in his mould. But I forgod to pring vun ven I comes out."—New York Press.

Hood's Dash Into Tennessee

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

November 24-28, 1864

[Copyright, 1904, by G. L. Kilmer.]

SHERMAN was not blind to the power of the foe he left behind him when he set out from Atlanta to march across Georgia to the sea the middle of November, 1864. His old opponent at Atlanta, General J. B. Hood, had swung westward into Alabama, not only defiant, but audaciously aggressive. In his bold yet futile attack upon Allatoona pass, in Sherman's rear, early in October, Hood gave the cue to his plans of campaign, which were to make a lunge into Tennessee and if successful invade Kentucky and perhaps Ohio.

The departure of Sherman for the east removed a great obstacle from Hood's path, since Sherman took along 60,000 of his troops. Sherman's eastward march, if prosecuted to a finish, would also endanger the Carolinas in the rear of Richmond and Lee, who was fighting heroically on the James. While Hood was glad to have Sherman and the 60,000 who had marched off with him out of the way, he nevertheless thought a dash of his own army across the border might cause the Yankees to turn westward again and let the Carolinas alone.

The day that Sherman started eastward from Atlanta Hood was at Florence, Ala., ready to cross the river northward. Forrest rejoined him there with his redoubtable cavalry fresh from a raid on the gunboats on the Tennessee river, well toward the Kentucky border. Hood's immediate objective was Columbia, on Duck river, in central Tennessee, and halfway from his starting point at Florence to Nashville, the headquarters of the Federal army in the west now that Sherman was out of the field.

But Hood had a foe to reckon with nearer than Nashville. Sherman had left the command in Tennessee to General George H. Thomas, who had more than once proved himself a rock in battle. Thomas was to make Nashville the Federal rallying point and stronghold of the west. In order to keep the wily foe at arm's length he had sent General J. M. Schofield forward as far as Pulaski, Tenn., on the river Tennessee, halfway between Columbia and Florence, but off the direct line eastward between Columbia and Florence. Schofield's command was the Twenty-third corps (his own) and the Fourth corps under General D. M. Stanley.

Hood's army started northward about Nov. 20, and on the 21st General Hatch's scouting Federal cavalry bore the news to Schofield that one corps of Hood's army was already abreast of Pulaski, only a few miles west, and heading for Columbia. Although Thomas had urged Schofield to wait at Pulaski for the strong re-enforcement of General A. J. Smith's division, which had been ordered to join him, Schofield decided to retreat to Columbia. He already had a small force there to command the bridge crossings.

From the 21st to the 23d it was a race between Hood's infantry and Schofield's for the crossing at Columbia. Schofield was closing in, but he learned that General Forrest was pushing back his opponents, the cavalry brigade of Colonel Capron, and Columbia was in danger of falling into Hood's hands. In that event Schofield would be cut off and the road to Nashville open to Hood. Skillfully thrusting forward his advance division of infantry between Forrest and Capron, he checked the bold Confederate. At nightfall the whole Federal force was in Columbia.

Columbia is south of Duck river, and Schofield had the disadvantage of a river at his back. The ground was favorable for defense on its immediate front, but the position might easily be flanked and retreat to the north bank cut off. This Schofield quickly noted, and the 24th of November found him at bay, anxiously watching the next move of his foe, who he thought would be too wise to make a frontal attack on the lines around the town.

General Thomas took a calm view of the situation and looked for the complete overthrow of Hood as soon as he got his scattered forces concentrated. He urged Schofield to hold on at Columbia and prepare defenses for the bridges, so that they might be intact when the army was ready to advance southward again. During the 24th and 25th the whole of Hood's infantry was in front of Columbia, and the night of the 25th Schofield sent one division of his army to the north side of the river. The Federal troops south of the river were brought within a new and shorter line of works ready to receive the attack.

Instead of attacking, Hood prepared to get across the river on Schofield's left flank and beat him in a race for the next point of advantage—namely, Franklin, on Harpeth river, halfway to Nashville. Forrest took the lead in this move and threw his cavalry north of Duck river at three places during the 28th. The weather was cold and rainy and the fords swollen by recent rains, but at nightfall one division had crossed and advanced four miles on the route to Franklin. Learning that the Federals were in force at Hurt's crossroads, Forrest determined to cut his way through and get to the rear of the enemy in Columbia. The Federal cavalry chief had but few men on the ground, the re-enforcements sent by Thomas for the emergency not having arrived. Forrest pursued his usual tactics of dismounting his troopers to fight on foot and pressed forward over the rugged, rocky country, driving the enemy at all points. Forrest and his escort remained in saddle. From a prisoner taken in a skirmish they learned that only a single regiment was on the front line disputing the advance, but the rest of the brigade lay a mile back, where the troopers were resting and feeding their horses.

It happened that Forrest and his escort were wearing over their gray uniforms rubber overcoats and leggings captured from the Federals. Taking advantage of this incident, they followed the retreating enemy and dashed into the Federal encampment, where in the confusion they were mistaken for friends. The Confederates opened fire with revolvers, and the Federals broke to the rear, with the exception of one regiment. After a volley which cut down a dozen of the escort this regiment retreated, leaving Forrest in possession of the camp, with sixty prisoners and their horses.

Throughout the night Forrest marched on in spite of the stubborn resistance of Wilson's cavalry. First heading northward, he turned to the northwest, flanking Wilson and cutting him off from Columbia completely, as well as getting between him and two fresh brigades coming down from Nashville to re-enforce him. Forrest, in fact, was striking for Spring Hill, a junction of roads leading northward from the river. The value of Spring Hill to Schofield and, of course, to Hood will be seen from the desperate efforts made by both leaders to get there first with the most men.

Being on the defensive, Schofield left the initiative at Columbia to his opponent. Hood took advantage of a bend in the river to bring batteries to bear upon the division of Federals intrenched north of the stream. This was merely a cover for the march of two corps in the pathway opened by Forrest around Schofield's left flank. When Schofield learned that the Confederate infantry was crossing down the river he ordered General Stanley to march at once to Spring Hill and seize the crossroads, keeping an open road between Franklin and Columbia. At the same time the Federal wagon trains started for Spring Hill, and Stanley's advance guard reached there just in time to prevent the capture of the entire train by Forrest, who was already in the outskirts of the place. Seven of Schofield's batteries had been sent back with Stanley, with orders to go to Franklin, but their chief assumed the responsibility of planting them on a ridge where they would command the road along which the troops were marching.

Meanwhile Schofield had drawn all his troops to the north bank of Duck river and disposed all but one division on the roads back toward Spring Hill, where they would be ready to support Stanley at Spring Hill or aid the single division left to hold the crossing at Columbia. Hood had crossed the river with the advance guard of infantry and after riding a few miles heard the sound of guns at Spring Hill, which told him that Forrest had met with opposition. General Pat Cleburne's renowned Tennessee division was rushed forward to aid Forrest, and the other troops pushed rapidly in the same direction.

Cleburne attacked the first Federals in sight with his usual vigor, but was repulsed by a single brigade posted to cover the Columbia road. This gallant brigade, under Colonel Bradley, was finally driven back, and Cleburne, supported by a fresh division, followed up at a charge until his line came under the fire of over forty guns which Captain Bridges had fortunately detained there. To Hood this mass of artillery suggested that Schofield's whole army was before him, and, night coming on, he suspended action to wait for the remainder of his army to get to the front. So at nightfall it was the turn of a hand whether Hood would cut the road and hem Schofield in between Spring Hill and Columbia or whether Schofield would slip through with 20,000 alert Confederate enemies scarcely an arm's length from the marching columns.

SOME REASONS WHY PEOPLE ARE SETTLING IN MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA.

Because it is the best country known to the man of moderate means.
Because you will find a country of rich soil awaiting the settler.
Because there are uplands, prarieland, and alluvial river bottoms.
Because you can be certain of profitable returns from whatever you put into the soil.
Because the winter does not consume what the summer produces.
Because there are more and better opportunities for deversified farming than elsewhere.
Because the seasons are regular and no fear of crop failure.
Because the country is never scourged by cyclones and devastating storms and blizzards.
Because everything grown elsewhere can be produced here more abundantly.
Because truck farming is a success; products being early on the market obtain high prices.
Because no better fruit country is known, oranges, plums, peaches, pears, apples, grapes, strawberries, figs, pecans and other fully maturing.
Because there are more chances for profitable investment of capital than elsewhere in this country.
Because for healthfulness this section is unequalled on the face of the globe.
Because you have no long winter months to encounter, with no excessive dry heat in summer.
Because the climate is more uniform than elsewhere, no extremes of heat or cold.
Because you will find the as orderly communities as anywhere on this continent.
Because you will find the most open-hearted people on the globe.
Because education is paramount; public schools and churches of every denomiuation are to be found in all communities.
Because the railroad facilities of this section are unexcelled, a double tracked railroad traversing the entire length of both states.
Because really good lands are yet cheap.
Because the geographical location of these states gives them the best markets in the United States.

We secure land for home-seekers or for colonies. Write to-day for full particulars and letters from Northern farmers already located in the South.

The Jiu Jitsuite's Undoing

PHILETUS BROWN secured by mail
a jiu jitsu
He learned the way to use strength with suddenness and force
And how to swiftly call in play each muscular resource;
He learned to twist
His hand and wrist
And knock you down without so much as doubling up his fist.

When he was letter perfect in the art Philetus Brown
Became the fistic champion and terror of the town.
Before you knew that he had moved he had you falling down;
When his quick jerk
Got in its work
You thought you'd been where dynamite and other dangers lurk.

He took big Henry Billiger, who weighed three hundred pounds,
And slammed him here and there with ease across the baseball grounds,
And Henry's gasps of wonder were the only noted sounds.
Within a week
No one would speak
Of physical perfection—we were mighty mild and meek.

One day while Brown of brawn and brain in boastful accents talked
Joe Smithers sauntered up and said his old roan mule had balked.
Philetus hunched his shoulders, and toward that mule he walked.
Though slight and slim.
His look was grim,
And we in expectation hastened out and followed him.

Philetus Brown removed his coat, complacent, calm and cool,
And boldly seized the pendent tail of Joseph Smithers' mule,
Unheeding Joe's remark that he was acting like a fool.
A swish, a buzz,
That's all there was,
Except an interrupted "Here's what jiu jitsu does!"

Philetus Brown is out again. He hobbles with a crutch
And wraps himself with bandages—he's still too sore to touch.
He hasn't yet explained the case—he isn't talking much.
Some of us thought
That like as not
The mule had learned a trick or two Philetus hadn't got.

Reason For Laughter.

When the young mistress of the house entered the kitchen she carried herself with great dignity. She had come to call the cook to account.

"Mary," she said, "I must insist that you keep better hours and that you have less company in the kitchen at night. Last night I was kept awake because of the uproarious laughter of one of your women friends."

"Yis, mum, I know," Mary replied cheerfully, "but she couldn't help it. I was telling her how you tried to make cake yesterday morning."—Birmingham (England) Post.

An Impressionist.

His Friend—But what does it mean?
The Artist—Ah, that's just it! Don't mean nawthin! I'm a impressionist!—New York American.

A Thing to Avoid.

"Ha, that's a clever story," laughed Dawson. "Here comes Borem; tell it to him."

"No," said Mawson, "it would be suggestive to him."

"Nonsense! Nobody could possibly consider that story suggestive."

"He could. He'd consider it suggestive of some old chestnut which he'd insist upon telling."—Catholic Standard and Times.

On Display.

Husband—Why in the world do you keep your new fur boa hanging out on the line?

Mrs. Fluffy—Because I nearly roast with it on this kind of weather and it's the only way I can let people know that I've got it.—Detroit Free Press.

Reward of Genius.

Meeks—There goes a successful inventor.

Weeks—So? What did he invent?

Meeks—He invented a new excuse to give his wife for remaining out till after midnight, and, strange to say, it worked.—Chicago News.

As to Love.

Aunt Jane—But do you really believe young Mr. Amour loves you as much as he says he does?

Eunice—Of course not, Aunt Jane. A lover who can't exaggerate his affection is just no lover at all.—Boston Transcript.

His Invention.

Mrs. McFlub—Your husband seems to be quite versatile. Has he ever invented anything?

Mrs. Sleeth—Oh, yes; one of the finest lines of midnight excuses you ever listened to.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

His Technical Defense.

"What reason does he give for not paying his wife alimony?"

"He says that marriage is a lottery, and hence alimony is a gambling debt."—Collier's Weekly.

Running No Risks.

"Have you any teeth, grandpa?"

"No, my boy."

"Then you can hold these nuts for me."—Columbia Jester.

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

Our old friends and neighbors for the past twenty years, Rev. and Mrs. Wm. E. George, are both quite feeble. At this writing the latter is very ill, so much so that all her family have been called to her bedside, viz: Messrs. Theopholis, A. Frederick, Charles, and Mrs. John L. Fitzwater, their only daughter. Mrs. George is eighty-two years old and has suffered with asthma for many years. Her attending physician has but little hope of her recovery.

We are also sorry to report the very critical illness of Pauline, the bright little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Jones, but at this writing her attending physicians, Drs. Lininger and McComas, have hopes of her recovery. She is the idol of her mother and father, and intelligent beyond her years. We do hope for the sake of the devoted parents and her absent brother that her life may be spared.

The explosion of No. 2000 engine at Mt. Lake Park on Sabbath last was visited by quite a number of our citizens who went up to see the horrible work that steam can do. Our good friend, Mr. Wm. W. Hennen, was well acquainted with the dead and maimed of this awful explosion and their family and friends have this wholesouled engineer's heartfelt sympathy.

Our citizens have been quite busy filling their ice houses the past week and say the ice is fine. We feel assured that the many who come to this popular summer resort will be kept cool when they again come to our mountain top.

Rev. Percy W. Metheney commenced a series of meetings in his church Sabbath last. Although the weather is stormy and rough his meetings are well attended. This young minister impresses our people of all churches as being a devout and sincere christian. We wish him a gracious outpouring of the Holy Spirit for the upbuilding of his Master's cause.

Rev. Mr. Faust is also conducting a revival service of his church at Elder Hill, this county, some 24 miles north of this place. If his meetings are as productive of good as they were here we shall rejoice also with this young brother.

We noticed in your last issue that the council of the Ev. Lutheran church had sold their church lot in the burned district of your city to your enterprising baker. We are glad that another prominent corner of Oakland is not monopolized by a saloon as is the case of the many old business stands of years ago.

A visit to the widow of the late Cyrus H. Shreve this afternoon finds her much improved in health, but her daughter Mrs. George P. Marley, is still quite ill. The doctor of our town thinks she is out of danger. Our sympathy goes out to this much afflicted family, who have been so recently bereft of a devoted husband and father.

Good kind hearted "Boss" Hinebaugh came to town to-day with his team and hauled out a load of supplies to the two old women that were found so destitute some weeks ago and their hearts were made glad by donations from kind Mrs. Lashorn, Mrs. Haulenbeck, Wm. W. Thrasher, David Brashears, Walter Bros, Mrs. John W. Williams, George Marley, and others. May Heaven's richest blessings be theirs for feeding and caring for these poor human beings who can't have long to suffer in this world for they are nearing and past the four-score mark.

A visit made yesterday (Monday) was appreciated by relations of this place who welcomed Mr. and Mrs. John Felty, Jr., of your town, who took advantage of the fine sleighing to test their new horse, and extend greetings of the new year, not only to relations, but friends of the years of the past when Mrs. Felty spent her girlhood days and her husband a former merchant of this place, where he made many friends who wish him every success in this life.

Mrs. Mahlon Glotfelty, of near McHenry, has been visiting at the home of Mr. Samuel P. Specht and daughter, the past week. Mrs. Glotfelty is one of the model matrons of Garrett county. She has a son and daughter living in our town, who are much respected by our young people.

Postmaster L. D. Thrasher was quite ill the past week, but Dr. Lininger has relieved him and he is at his post attending to the duties of "Uncle Sam" as faithful as ever. Deer Park can boast of an efficient and faithful official and one that is kind and obliging to all alike, let it be high or low, rich or poor.

Our faithful rural carriers on routes Nos. 1 and 2 are facing the storms of winter and making their rounds on time, regardless of the huge snow drifts. Two more accomodating gentlemen could not be found than ex-Squire J. L. Wheeler and Alex C. George, one but recently out from a severe spell of sickness, the other depressed by the serious illness of an aged and devoted mother, but both have efficient assistants in case of an emergency in the persons of Mr. Gay Wheeler and Clarence Lashorn.

Miss Kate Brown, the beautiful and accomplished daughter, of Mrs. Edward G. Miller, is spending the remainder of the winter with her mother and father. Miss Brown is quite an acquisition to the bevy of pretty young ladies of our town, and many socials have greeted her since she came from her West Virginia home.

Again, Mr. Editor, we say good night and pleasant dreams.

BLOOMINGTON.

Miss Celia Spence, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Spence, was taken to the Hoffman hospital, Keyser, on last Friday morning suffering from an attack of appendicitis. An operation was performed by Dr. Hoffman on last Sunday afternoon. Late reports of her condition bring the most favorable news to parents, relatives and friends.

The remains of Mr. John Simpson, fireman on the ill-fated locomotive that exploded near Mt. Lake Park on last Sunday morning were brought to Piedmont by special train on Wednesday afternoon. Funeral services under the auspices of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and the I. O. O. F. were held in the M. E. church, Piedmont, after which they were buried in Philos cemetery Westernport.

So far as the destruction of railroad property is concerned, the most disastrous wreck that has ever occurred on the W. Va. C. & P. R. R., took place on Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock, when engine No. 31, drawing a heavy train of big steel hoppers loaded with coal, bound for Cumberland, collided head on with a triple header bound south coming out of the Junction Yards. The collision occurred at the county road crossing a few hundred yards south of where the W. Va. passes under the B. & O. bridge. Both engines were completely wrecked, turned over on their sides at the bottom of a slight embankment near the meeting point, while a third engine assisting the triple header was badly damaged. The road-bed is completely torn up for five or six hundred yards, many cars demolished beyond repair, and many more disabled. Both trains were under yard regulations, running at a slow rate of speed which gave the crews time to jump and escape without injury. Passenger trains transferred passengers at the wreck on Tuesday night and were from two to three hours late. A track was completely around the wreckage by Wednesday morning and trains running as usual.

Born unto Mr. and Mrs. Forback on last Sunday night, a bright little daughter.

Mr. John Elliott, son of Mr. Adam Elliott, had two fingers of his right hand badly lacerated on last Monday afternoon by a fall of coal while at work in the Buxton mine.

The Board of County Commissioners for Garrett Co., accompanied by Clerk Ross, of Oakland, left on train No. 2 Tuesday morning to inspect the city jails of New York City, preparatory to drawing up plans and specifications for the new county jail to be erected at Oakland.

Mr. N. U. Bond, of Bond Bros., this county, returned from a business trip to N. Y. City on last Saturday. While in the city Mr. Bond combined pleasure with business and called upon a number of his relatives and school mates who are prominent Tammany braves and hold high positions in the City Government. The warm hand was given to friend Bond and many points of interest visited. After dining at the Waldorf Astoria, a trip in the subway and a visit to the swell clubs of Gotham, District Attorney Jerome very kindly suggested a walk across the Bridge of Sighs and an introduction to Nan Patterson, who is held for the murder of Cæsar Young. Mr. Bond having understood before arriving in New York that "Nan" had been after a bond since her first trial, very courteously refused the invitation of his friend Jerome.

GRANTSVILLE.

We are having excellent sleighing at present.

A last week's item corrected: The Jennings Railroad is hauling from twelve to fifteen car loads of lumber per day instead of that number each week.

Last Friday the hackmen of Salisbury took twenty lads and lassies of that town out sleighing, stopping in our town a few hours where they were hospitably entertained by Mr. and Mrs. S. O. Bender.

On last Saturday afternoon Messrs. J. J. Bender and Hershberger gave the juvenile portion of Grantsville a pleasant outing. There were 45 of them in the company. They were driven around by Springs, Pa., where they stopped long enough to lay in a supply of candy. The little folks took advantage of the suggestion to exercise their vocal organs and as a result they created quite as they passed through town shouting and waving flags. Giving these youngsters a sleigh ride is a popular idea and should be encouraged. They enjoy it and appreciate the generosity just as much if not more than grown-up folks.

One hundred and forty-five people attended the big supper given by the ladies' Aid Society of the Lutheran church at the home of Samuel Loechel. The crowd was composed of people from Salisbury, Grantsville and Jennings.

Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Bender had as their guests last Saturday and Sunday Mr. Landis, of Berlin, Pa., and Miss Grace Yutzy, of Pocahontas, Pa. Both are teachers in the Somerset county (Pa.) public schools.

Miss Carrie Dorsey has returned home from an extended visit through the Western states.

Last Friday evening the following ladies and gentlemen of Meyersdale, Pa., took supper at the Castleman Hotel: Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Bishop, Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Hoblitzell, Mr. and Mrs. O. G. Getty, Dr. and Mrs. Bruce Lichty, Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Philson, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Dill, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Phalmer, Mr. and Mrs F. B. Thomas, Mrs. S. A. Kendall, and Mrs. A. F. Getty, of Cumberland. The party came over to this place in sleighs and spent an enjoyable evening.

Alonzo Butler, employed by the King Lumber Company near here cut a deep gash in his foot on last Friday. The cut severed a small artery.

A man named Eisentrout, from Niverton, Pa., while engaged in a melee recently, was nearly killed, his injuries consisting of a number of cuts in his face. Dr. Louderbaugh dressed his wounds and otherwise administered to his wants. There is a clique of rowdies who come here, get full of liquor and then on their way home pollute the moral atmosphere with their blasphemies and foulvociferations. A more vigorous exercise of the law would not have a bad effect upon such people.

A little son of Mr. Rudolph Yoder is critically ill.

Mrs. Emanuel Hershberger, who has been suffering with nervous debility, is again convalescent.

At 7.30 on next Friday evening the Cicerone Literary Society will render a choice program to which all are invited to be present. The numbers include readings, musical duets, monologues, solos and a debate, the subject of which will be: Resolved, "That the Laboring Men are Justified in Organizing Unions."

VOLUME 28. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1905. NUMBER 49

FOUND DEAD ON PORCH AT GRANTSVILLE.

John Beachy, a Young Man, Dead From Effects of Liquor and Laudanum.

DISCOVERED YESTERDAY MORNING

Lying In Front of U. O. Blocher's Store In Grantsville—Last Seen Preceding Night and was Drinking Laudnaum and Whiskey.

News reached this office this morning by telephone from Grantsville stating that the dead body of John Beachy, aged about twenty-nine years, had been found on the porch fronting the store of Mr. U. O. Blocher in that town yesterday morning, death having been caused by a combination of causes, principally whiskey and laudanum, which had been indulged in by the unfortunate young man the night preceding.

The young man was in the store of Mr. Blocher on Tuesday night with several other parties and about eleven o'clock when Mr. Blocher closed his place Beachy left, but not before he had asked the proprietor for some laudanum. During the evening Beachy had taken a number of drinks from a bottle he had containing the dope and Mr. Blocher refused to sell him more. He also imbibed pretty freely of whiskey.

Yesterday morning about five o'clock the body of Mr. Beachy was found in a sitting posture on the porch in front of the Blocher store, frozen stiff, he evidently having been there for a number of hours.

The man was unmarried. He will be buried tomorrow afternoon.

E OLD MAIDS' CONVENTION

Be Given In the Opera House, As a Benefit for the Lutheran Church.

"The Old Maids' Convention, which will be rendered in the Oakland Opera House on the evening of February 7th, is a production eminently worthy the patronage of the citizens of Oakland and community.

It is a comic extravaganza, replete with mirth producing passages and promises to be admirably rendered.

To those wishing an evening's entertainment, we heartily recommend this production, and feel satisfied that they will be highly entertained. It depicts a session of the "Young Ladies' Single Blessedness Society" and the grotesque costumes and laughable sayings and doings of the members of the Society in devising ways and means to capture eligible members of the opposite sex, is laughable in the extreme.

As the different characters are all represented by Oakland ladies and as the object for which it is given is a laudable one, viz: for the benefit of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran congregation, we trust it will meet with the patronage and support of the good people of Oakland and vicinity and promise them an entertainment of more than ordinary excellence.

Purchased Garrett Couuty Coal Lands

W. T. Tyler & Co., Philadelphia, have acquired the property of the Datesman Coal Company in Garrett county, 57 miles south of Cumberland, on the West Virginia Central and Pittsburg railway and have commenced operations. Their purchase includes an up-to-date coal mining plant with 2,000 acres of coal. The plant will operate under the name of the Storer Run Coal Company. J. W. Thomas, president, and W. T. Tyler, treasurer of the company, were here this week looking after its interests. H. E. Gray is the superintendent.

Wreck at Bloomington.

A slight mishap was reported from Bloomington Saturday morning, in which three cars were smashed up and some freight scattered about the tracks. A broken rail was said to have caused the wreck. The train men escaped injury.

BRYAN CALLS THE POE LAW EXTREMELY WICKED.

Attorney General Bitterly Attacks Disfranchising Act.

WRONG IN PRINCIPAL AND THEORY

Mr. Bryan Says It Was Conceived In Fraud And Brought Forth In Trickery—Denounces Legislature.

In Saturday's issue of the Baltimore Evening News, Attorney William S. Bryan retiterated the charge that he made before the Court of Appeals on Thursday that the so-called Poe disfranchising law is "wicked" and that "it was conceived in fraud and brought forth in trickery." Mr. Bryan made these charges while appearing as the representative of Governor Warfield to defend the latter in the mandamus proceedings brought by Chairman Murray Vandiver of the Democratic State Central Committee to compel the Governor to formally promulgate the disfranchising constitutional amendment passed by the last Legislature.

"I have maintained from the very first that this constitutional amendment was wrong in principle and theory," declared Mr. Bryan today, "and I shall continue to maintain it as long as I have breath. It is both criminal and wicked for the Legislature of the great State of Maryland to delegate to four irresponsible individuals in any polling place to say whether I can or cannot vote. The use of the term wicked to describe such an act or Constitutional amendment is almost too weak.

"From the time that the constitutional amendment now under discussion was first broached I have been against it, as the fies of the the News itself will show. The amendment has a number of provisions, several of which were more or less similar to the provisions of other amendments which were offered, including one which I prepared myself, but it was in the educational qualification clause that the trick nature of the amendment is apparent. This clause delegates to the election judges in each precinct the unrestricted right to decide whether a man has a sufficient intelligence to vote. I don't believe any language is too strong for the purpose of denouncing such a delegation of power. The amendment, if adopted, would place the election absolutely in the hands of the men who appointed the judges of election, for the latter in turn would have the absolute right to prevent any man they choose from voting.

"I base my argument against the legality of the amendment upon the ground that it passed the Legislature in the form of an act, which should have been signed by the Governor. As is well-known, the Governor did not sign it. The fact that the act was deposited with the Clerk of the Court of Appeals did not effect the matter in one way or the other, according to my view of the case, for as I said before the Court of Appeals, the Legislature could, so far as affecting the amendment's legality was concerned, just as easily have given the act to Murray Vandiver for safekeeping."

Final arguments were made before the Court of Appeals on the Poe case on Thursday, Mr. Edgar Gans appearing with Mr. Bryan as council for Governor Warfield. Messrs. Bernard Carter and John P. Poe, reputed author of the amendment, appeared for Mr. Vandiver, and claimed that the amendment was legally passed and that Governor Warfield must promulgate it so that it can appear upon the official ballot next fall. The Court has taken the matter under advisement.

Meeting Night Changed.

Death of a Young Man.

Wilson Halterman died at the home of his parents near Henry, W. Va., of dyphtheria, aged 20 years. The deceased is survived by a father and one brother, who also has diphtheria. The father of the deceased is the man who sold to C. D. Gillispe, of Brooklyn Heights fame, a few months ago one hundred acres of ground near Henry for $31,500, on which to operate a saloon and store.

FOUR MORE BUILDINGS DESTROYED BY FIRE.

Flames Were Discovered Yesterday Morning About 3:30 Between Two Buildings on Railroad Street.

HOTEL, HESEN'S SALOON AND TWO DWELLINGS GO

Monetary Loss on Buildings Small—West Hotel Was One of the Old Landmarks, Having Been Built Many Years Prior to the War—Insurance Will Cover Losses, Except in the Case of Household Furniture of Tenants in the Buildings.

For the second time within the period of less than a month, Oakland has been visited by fire of considerable magnitude, the last visitation having occurred yesterday (Wednesday) morning about 3:30 o'clock, when flames were discovered between two buildings located on Railroad street near the Second street crossing, and before they could be subdued four buildings had been destroyed, along with the major portion of their contents.

The houses burned were the West hotel, an old landmark built prior to the Civil War, the Hesen saloon, a two-story structure, a dwelling owned by Mrs. D. H. Loar and occupied by Mary Denmark, colored, and her two children, and the William Smouse house, owned by Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill, the latter being occupied as a cobbler shop by Hampton McRobie and "Bill" Purnell and his family.

All the buildings burned were old and fast decaying, with the exception of the Hesen property, which was erected some fifteen years ago by C. C. Michael and later sold by him to Hesen.

The loss on the buildings, with the exception of the one owned by Mrs. Loar, are fully covered by the insurance.

It is the opinion of many that the fire was of a purely indendiary origin, it having been set between the Loar house and the Hesen building.

Oakland has been particularly unfortunate thus far during the year 1905 in the number and destructiveness of the fires which have been her portion, the second one within a period of four weeks taking place yesterday morning when four buildings, all frame structures, were entirely consumed.

The buildings burned were the West Hotel, owned by Mr. Truman West of Oakland, built at the interesection of Second and Railroad streets, the Hessen saloon property, a dwelling owned Mrs. H. H. Loar and a dwelling owned by Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill.

The fire was discovered about 3 30 between the Hesen building and the Loar building, which was separated by space of less than a foot and before anything could be done had gained such headway as to make it impossible to check it. Between the hotel building and the Hesen building there is an alley of sixteen feet. Over this space the flames leaped and communicated the fire. The Loar and Hamill buildings were erected close together and it was but the work of a few minutes for the flames to eat their way through to the latter.

In the second story of the Hesen building George W. Ward and his son Will lived, having as their guests the night of the fire Ex-Sheriff W. P. Lee and his son Clarence. All were asleep when the fire broke out Mr. Lee being the first one to be aroused by the stifling smoke which had accumulated in the room. Exit by way of the stairway was cut off by the fire and to escape all the occupants jumped from the window leaving their shoes and some other clothing behind. No household goods were saved from this building, nor was any of the stock. The business was only recently purchased by Mr. Lee's sons, they having taken charge one day last week.

The West hotel was occupied by Mr. J. M. Sommers who had recently fitted it up with furnishings. Most of the goods from this building were carried out.

The Loar house, in which lived Mary Denmark and her two children, was a mass of flames before anything could be taken from it and as a result everything it contained was burned, leaving the woman destitute of clothing and household goods. Her wants were relieved yesterday by some of the citizens who made up a purse for her benefit and by the merchants who donated groceries.

In the Hamill building Hampton McCrobie had his cobbler shop on the first floor. His tools and materials were carried out. On the second floor lived "Bill" Purnell. Most of his household goods were burned.

The buildings burned, with the possible exception of the Hesen saloon, were practically of little value, being extremely old and out of repair. On the West building there was an insurance of $1500, which covers it. The Hesen building and contents were insursd for $2100, while upon the Loar and Hamill structures there was no insurance.

It is the general opinion of the people of Oakland that the fire was of an incendiary origin. It is reported this morning that the State Fire Marshal has been communicated with and is expected here shortly to make an investigation.

A LITTLE BOY FATALLY BURNED

Fifteen-months' Old Child of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Brown.

CLOTHES CAUGHT FROM GRATE

While Parents Were Absent from the House—Child Was Left in Care of Older Brother Who Beat Out Blaze.

Last Wednesday afternoon the little child of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Brown, who reside on Mr. Elisha Aronahlt's farm over in the Ryans Glade section of Garrett county, was so badly burned that its death followed on Friday morning.

The child, a bright little fifteen-mouths' old boy, was left in a room with an older brother by his mother, who went to the barn to milk some cows. In the room where the children were left there is an open grate and the smaller child was playing about this when some coals either fell or was drawn from it with a stick which set the dress of the little one on fire. The older child had gone to the porch and hearing his brother's screams ran back into the house and with a mitten he had in his hand succeeded in beating out the fire but not before it had inflicted such injuries as to cause its death on Friday following.

Mrs. Brown is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Aronhalt who are spending the winter in the South for the benefit of Mr. Aronhalt's health.

The funeral of the child took place on Saturday morning, interment being made on the home farm.

GUILTY OF MANSLAUGHTER

Jury Rendered Its Verdict In The Easton Case.

After being out almost 22 hours the jury in the case of Frederick Easton, of Hagerstown, tried at Cumberland for the murder of Lorenzo D. Kline, rendered a verdict of manslaughter Sunday afternoon and recommended the prisoner to the mercy of the court. Only a few persons besides Judge Henderson, the counsel and the jury were in the courtroom when the verdict was rendered.

Easton had anxiously awaited the verdict, staved up past midnight awaiting the result, and when the verdict was rendered he broke down completely, nearly collapsed, and had to be assisted to the jail by Deputy Sheriff Hodel. He told Deputy Hodel that, while he believed he should have been acquitted, he did not care so much for his own future as for that of his little son.

It is understood the jury stood six for acquittal, one for first degree murder and others for second degree murder and manslaughter on the first ballot, finally, after 18 ballots, compromising on manslaughter.

ACTION OF CHURCH COMMITTEE RATIFIED

By the Congregation of St. Mark's Ev-Lutheran Church In Purchase of

CORRIGAN LOT FOR CHURCH SITE

Committee Appoined, In Conjunction With Official Board to Select Plans for Edifice—Will Be Located On Corner.

Tuesday evening of this week a largely attended congregational meeting of the members of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church was held in the Garrett Memorial church when definite and final action was taken with respect to the rebuilding of the church edifice which was burned four weeks ago to-day.

A few days after the burning of the building a committee was appointed to look after eligible locations as a site for the proposed church, three of which were reported upon at a meeting held later, among them being the Corrigan lot at the corner of Alder and Third Streets just opposite the original church. At the meeting held Tuesday night the action of the committee appointed in securing an option on this property was ratified, the price to be paid for the lot being $3400.

The congregation also decided to erect the church on the corner of the lot and a committee, in conjuction with the official board, was appointed to select plans for the edifice.

TO MANUFACTURE STAVES

Pennsylvanians Have Purchased Timber Land in District No. 8 for that Purpose.

Messrs. Joseph Dreese and E. G. Goss, of Mifflin county, Pa., purchased last week from Mr. I. W. Abernathy and others in District No. 8, this county, several hundred acres of timber, and they will at once begin the manufacture of staves for nail kegs and other small receptacles of a like nature. Soft woods, with the exception of chestnut, will be used exclusively for the purpose.

The machinery necessary for the equipment of the mill will arrive on the ground within a few days and will be located at the Still House spring on Mr. Abernathy's farm. The shipping point will be Wilson on the West Virginia Central Railroad.

Grange Meeting.

The Garrett County Grange will meet on Saturday, February 11th, 1905, at one o'clock p. m., in Naylor's Hall, for the purpose of installing officers and to transact business of importance. All are urgently requested to be present. GEO E. BISHOFF, Lecturer.

Jesus At Jacob's Well.

Jesus was tranferring the scene of his ministery from Judea to Gallilee; but while in transit he quietly placed the leaven of His gospel in the very heart of populous Samaria. He had spent eight months of the first years of His public life in and around Jerusalem, but the approach of winter, and that worse winter of Pharisaical hostility, bade Him find a more congenial locality. He ignored the prejudice of the Jews, and gave His disciples an object-lesson by going through Samaria. . . . After four days' journey, at midday, Jesus, wearied, sat thus upon the well. "'Thus,' not upon a throne, or chair, or cushion," but as a wayfaring man would, upon the ground, his side against the stone parapet of the well. His arm upon its top, and His head supported by his hand. See in this the reality of our Savior's human nature! . . . A woman approaches. She comes, perhaps, at this unusual hour because her character made it impossible for her to come at the seasons when the pure maids and matrons of Sychar visited the well. She lowers her large earthen vessel by a cord which she has brought for the purpose, a hundred feet to the cool, crystal water. Just as she lifts the dripping jar to her head the dusty Traveler asks a drink. Jesus put Himself under obligation to her at the very start by His request. He took her good will for granted. A compliment was implied. "We despise not him whose service we ask." . . . What magic in kindness! This obtuse and sinful woman, used only to epithet and blow—gentle politeness transmute her into a docile pupil. She recognizes the nationality of the Stranger. Countenance, accent, and garb betrayed Him. A Jew—but where is the racial prejudice? She vaguely recognizes the moral superiority of the person before her, and is prepared for the step in advance, to which Jesus leads her in His next remark. . . . . Poetry is, in large measure, the association of superior ideas with common objects. If that be so, Jesus was an ideal poet. He takes the commonest of objects, water, and the commonest of experiences, the quenching of thirst with this natural fluid, to portray the most uncommon experience of the human soul. The woman sees the enigma. She is set a-wondering, and that, for he, was a great gain: for "wonder provokes progress." . . . While she still looselv holds to the literal, and talks of the depth of the well and the lack of drawing appliances, she yet skirts the edge of the Savior's spiritual meaning, and knows in her heart that He who talks with her is greater than the patriarch (whom she claimed as a progenitor) who bestowed upon his descendants the great boon of this excellent well. . . . Jesus lets in a new ray of light upon a mind from which the mists have already begun to lift when He contrasts nature's water with the living water. Water for only the briefest possible period slakes thirst. The path to the fountain is well trodden, but the grief of God is the transplanting of a perennial fountian into the very soul—a fountain whose tall jet penetrates even to the immortal life above. . . . The poor Samaritan heretic and outcast is enamored of this "gift" so wondrously described. She asks for it, but in terms which reveal the fact that the husks of literalism have not all been stripped off. The heaviest duty of her life is this frequent two-mile journey from city to well and back; the laborious drawing with the crudest possible appliances; the carrying of the heavy jar upon the head. If the gift of God will set her free from all this toil, and yet keep her from thirst, of course she wants it. At the same time she has a drawing consciousness that the gift means more than this. . . . . Like a skillful surgeon, kind but firm, Jesus inserts the gleaming lancet of His question. The hideous incidents of an adulterous career are laid bare in a moment. The woman is in the presence of Omniscience. The exact and minute details of her unsavory life are noted. Yet such mercy and gentleness is irresistible. The thing is done, not in such a manner as to make her cry, "Hast thou found me out, O mine enemy?" but rather, "Sir, I perceive Thou art a Prophet." . . . A seared conscience is softened, confession is made and tears of penitence flow. She rises now easily to the high spiritual plane of the Savior's teaching. She knows that the water of which He spoke is for the washing of regeneration—the gift is a new heart to which the Spirit bears witness. . . . In the joy of her new life she propounds a practical question to the Divine Teacher, whom it was her happy fortune to meet that day. Where shall she worship the Infinite One, whose ineffable gift she had just received? On Gerizim—to which she pointed as she spoke—according to hereditary instruction, or in Jerusalem, from which He had just come? In answer to this question, Jesus unfolds that basal principle of Christianity, that all the earth is holy, and one spot more holy than another; that the item of topography in religion is henceforth erased; and, further, that henceforth, to a Spirit-God spirit-sacrifices only shall be made. (Heb. ix, 14; Rom. xii, 1.) . . . The woman, her clouded mind now thoroughly illuminated, looked up, and adoringly exclaimed. "Your teaching is just like that which we might expect from the Messiah Himself!" The Savior accepts her loving challenge; and in despised Samaria, and to a woman till late degraded, He made His first categorical declaration of Messiahship.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The Samaritan woman may well represent that class who probably would never come to Jesus of the own accord, as Nicodemus stands for the seeking and inquiring class. Some seem thoroughly unspiritual; they have eyes and ears, but never use them in religious matters. They are likely to die in the treadmill of the daily tasks which concern that we shall eat and drink and wear. How to get them above the rut, so that they may see the new heaven and the new earth—that is the problem. They will not come to us. We must go to them. We must make an opportunity to speak to them of religion. . . . Two classes, but one gospel for both! Not one gospel for Nicodemus and another for the Samaritan woman. Jesus gives the same testimony to the ignorant schismatic and sinner as to the sanctified Pharisee. The terminus is the same, but the approaches are necessarily different. . . . However, it is an open question whether this latter scene does not portray the ideal method of soulsaving. See how Jesus takes the commonest incident and makes it a starting-point; how He leads on gently by carefully framed questions and statements. He does not grow impatient with inveterate obtuseness. He is not diverted from the end in view by desultory questions. He is gentility itself, but allowed of no evasion. He helps the woman first to see herself, then to see Him—herself a sinner, Himself a Savior. . . . En route Jesus would pass by Gibeon, and would be reminded of Saul; Bethel, and would think of Jacob and his angel-crowded ladder, and Shiloh, the resting-place of the tabernacle. The general appearance of the country surrounding Sychar is unchanged since Jesus' day. The wheatfields of the rich plain of Elmukhnah, to which the Master pointed His disciples, still look like billowy seas whose waves seem to break on the base of twin mountains. . . . What associations are here! On Gerizim Melchizedeke officiated as priest of the Most High God. There Abraham reared his first altar. There stood six of the tribes reciting the blessings, while on opposite Ebal the other six responded with the curses of the law. Just beneath is that parcel of ground which Jacob, on his return from exile purchased for a hundred pieces of silver, and which he bequeathed to Joseph. There Joseph's mummied form was finally interred. But all these associations are eclipsed by that pictorial scene which the evangelist has delineated with inimitable skill.

Mosaic from Commentaries.

Jacob's well: One of the few sites about which there is no dispute—seventy-five feet deep, but originally much deeper, as the bottom has been filled with rubbish; seven feet six inches in diameter.—Hasting's Bib. Dict. Give Me to drink: No line of proceeding would be more likely to conciliate the woman's feelings.—Ryle. Thou being a Jew: Recognized by His dress. Colors on fringe of His garment were white; that of a Samaritan would be blue.—Riddle. Askest drink: Wonder that He seeks a friendly compact with one of a hostile race.—Trumbull. If thou knewest: Pathos of the situation strikes Jesus. Woman stands on brink of greatest possibilities, but is unconscious of them.—Ex. Greek Test. Living water: Perennial, springing from an unfailing source.—Lange. If thou knewest: All the time God's utmost gift is at men's hands.—Wayland Hoyt. Thou wouldst have asked Him: Spiritually positions reversed. Thou close to well, yet unable to drink. I can give thee water.—Camb. Bib. Nothing to draw with: No leather bucket—a skin with three cross-sticks at mouth to keep it open; let down by goat's-hair rope.—Vincent. Unconsciously gives utterance to a spiritual truth: Water of life naturally beyond human reach.—Mowatt. Neither come all the way hither to draw: The woman hoped to be emancipated from the humdrum and severe tasks of life. She was and she was not! Probably to old age she continued the Oriental woman's most toilsome task—drawing and carrying water. But the hitherto monotonous task was transmuted into a joy. She had a new motive in life, a secret spring of joy and strength.—Davis W. Clark. Jesus went through Samaria of set purpose to break down the partition-wall between races. He makes the first declaration of His Messiahship to an alien in order that the Jews may know that, though salvation is through the Jews, the have no right to dam it up within the narrow boundaries of their nationality. These streams are to flow out, and make glad the whole earth.—Ibid.

Dear Sir: There are these five ways of badness in paint:

(1) stuffed-out with chalk, or something like that;

(2) barytes, better than chalk, but no covering to it; nobody know it's there;

(3) benzine in the oil, or water, or other such stuffing;

(4) too thin—too much liquid, whatever it is, for the solid;

(5) short measure;

Now will you buy by the price per "gallon?"

THE PRESS AS AN EDUCATOR

An Address Before the American Association for Advancement of Science.

To the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Prof. William H. Lynch, of Salem, Mo., spoke on the subject of the "Press as An Educator." He said, in part:

"Jules Verne, the world famous novelist, recently predicted that long before the middle of the century novels or romances, in volume form, will have been supplanted by the newspapers.

"It must be obvious to all thoughtful persons that the newspapers may easily be made the medium of imparting valuable instruction in many departments of knowledge on which the very latest textbooks are mere blanks. Take for example, the experiments of Marconi in wireless telegraphy, so minutely recorded and illustrated in almost every newspaper. Would not the study of dispatches describing the achievements of the great Italian by boys and girls sufficiently advanced to understand them be infinitely more profitable than the dull book pages they are compelled to read concerning the laying of the first ocean cables so many years ago?

"Take another current subject, with the discussion of which the news papers have been filled in the most instructive and luminous way—that of Venezuela. What might not a competent teacher, with the aid of the press, have accomplished in the treatment of this question toward instilling in the minds of his pupils correct understanding and conception of the Monroe doctrine, let us say, or a knowledge of the Spanish American republics generally and our relations to them. Then there was a great coal strike, and the war between Russia and Japan.

"In the school books are a few meager facts and dates, forgotten almost as soon as they are learned. With the universal interest then centered in the subject, and the assistance of the newspapers, the skillful teacher could have done more to expand and inform the minds of all those intrusted to his care than the textbook writers combined. Children should not, of course, be permitted to read everything printed even in the newspapers. The Twentieth-Century editor must tell the story of the world day by day, or make ready sooner or later to stop his publication. The very utmost he can do is to minimize the record of evil doing and to encourage all that is pure and wholesome. And that, notwithstanding all that is said to the contrary, is the rule of action of the overwhelming majority of American editors."

OLD AND NEW COINS.

Some Interesting Facts About the Coinage of the Different Mints.

The director of the mint is called on to answer such a wide range of questions concerning the values of old and new coins and medals that he has found it necessary to issue circulars covering matters of this sort. They tell some interesting facts. It appears that the mint does not buy old coins or paper money, except some rare colonial coins in fine condition, which are desired for the mint cabinet. Mutilated or uncurrent United States gold and silver coin is purchased as bullion. The mint has no pattern piece for sale. The government pays no premium for the return of any of its coins or paper money. New coins cannot be struck until authorized by an act of Congress. The mint supplies United States coins only, and not any of past date. The $50 gold pieces and the half-dollar and quarter-dollar pieces of gold were struck by private parties on the California coast during the '49 period, and not by the United States government.

The coinage of the following coins ceased in the years named: Half and 1 cent, copper, in 1857; 1 cent, nickel, 1864; half dime and 3 cents, silver, and 2 cents, bronze, in 1873; 20 cents; silver, 1878; trade dollars, 1883; one dollar and three dollars, gold, and 3 cents, nickel, 1889. The Columbian half dollar was coined in 1892, and the Isabella quarter in 1893. The Lafayette dollar was struck in 1899, the date on the coin, 1900, being that of the unveiling of the memorial.

There are certain markings on every United States coin that enables the place of its coinage to be located, Those struck at the Philadelphia mint have no mint mark, but those struck at all other mints are distinguished by a small letter on the reverse, near the bottom. These letters are C. for Charlotte, N. C., discontinued in 1861; CC for Carson City, Nev., discontinued in 1893; D for Dahlonega, Ga., discontinued in 1861; O for New Orleans and S for San Francisco. The coins of the United States now authorized by law are:

In gold, double eagle; in silver, half dollar, quarter dollar and dime; minor, 5 cents, nickel and 1 cent, bronze. A person may buy a proof set of gold coins from the mint for $38 50 and a proof set of silver and minor coins for $1.50. When the business of the mints is slack, medals may be struck from dies furnished by individuals, public institutions and incorporated societies at a charge sufficient to cover the cost of the operation and the value of the metal.

B. & O.-WABASH AGREEMENT FILED

Formal Action To Secure Use of Land Along Canal For Completion of Link With W. V. C.

A decree signed by Judge Keedy, which means the settlement of the controversy between the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and the Western Maryland, or Wabash, has been filed in Hagerstown. The papers show that the rival lines have come to an agreement regarding certain lands of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal—18 strips situated in Washington and Allegany counties—that the Western Maryland Railroad acquires; also the privilege of crossing the canal at different points on the new extension from Big Pool to Cumberland; and also the area of 40 acres of land upon which the Western Maryland is to dump waste earth, and other privileges.

The report, agreement, exhibits and other papers in the case were filed in court by J. Clarence Lane, attorney for the canal trustees, and, were taken by him to Cumberland, where B. A. Richmond had the decree prepared, and it was signed by Judge Keedy. The decree recites all the papers and proceedings leading up to the settlement, and appoints Messrs. Hugh L. Bond, Jr., and Benjamin A. Richmond special trustees to report a sale of all the rights in canal lands wanted by the Western Maryland to the court for the sum of $500,000, and authorizes the conveyance of the said lands to the Western Maryland after the ratification. The bond of the special trustees is fixed at $600,000, and questions as to the distribution of said fund are reserved for further action of the court.

The last legal obstruction is removed from the right of way of the Western Maryland from Big Pool to Cumberland by the settlement, and the Company can now finish its connection to link the Western Maryland with the West Virginia Central, furnishing a through line from the coal fields to Baltimore. The lands along the canal acquired by the railroad, though secured at the cost of $50,000, were practically useless to the Canal Company, though of great value to the railroad.

The Simple Life

BY

CHARLES WAGNER

President Roosevelt Says to the Author of it :

"I AM PREACHING YOUR BOOK TO MY COUNTRYMEN." :: :: ::

Will Begin Next Week as a Serial in this Paper

TO aspire to the simple life is to rightly aspire to the fulfilment of the highest human destiny. All the movements of humanity toward more justice and more light have been at the same time movements toward a more simple life. And the antique simplicity in arts, manners and ideas hold for us their incomparable value only because it has been able to give a powerful relief to some essential sentiments, to some fixed truths. We must love that simplicity and guard it piously. But he will have gone but the hundredth part of his road who holds to exterior forms, and who does not seek to realize the spirit. In fact, it is impossible for us to be simple in the same ways as were our forbears, and we can only remain so, or return to simplicity in the same spirit. We are walking in other paths, but the aim of humanity is fundamentally the same. It is always the polar star which directs the mariner, no matter whether he is embarked on a sailing ship or a steamer.

To advance towards this aim with all the means of which we can dispose is the most important thing, today as ever. And it is because we have often been drawn aside that we have confused and complicated our lives.

The Simple Life has had a larger circulation among the literary inclined than any other story published in recent years

DRAWING DOWN HEAT FROM SUN.

An Engineering Idea of Harnessing Old Sol's Rays for Motive Power.

St Louis capital has become interested in the engineering idea of harnessing the sun's rays as a motive power for an engine which shall be a commercial commodity. John Boyle, Jr., of that city, is the president of a company which will erect at Needles, Cal., a low-temperature engine operated by the heat of the sun.

The engine is the invention of H. E. Willsie, a trained engineer and a graduate of the mechanical engineering course of the University of Wisconsin.

Needles, Cal., has been selected for the first plant because it has in a great degree the most desirable features for such an engine. No place in the United States, it is said, has clearer skies, higher temperatures, more fertile ground or a more abundant water supply. This first plant will be adapted mainly for irrigation purposes, but an electric dynamo and other machinery for a ranch will be installed later.

The solar engine is exactly the same in all its essential features as the ordinary steam engine. Any steam engine of first-class construction, it is said, would do equally well for its work. The labor and cost of operating it is said to be about the same as a steam engine, minus the cost of fuel. For this reason it is expected to prove a boon in the regions of the Southwest, where fuel is extremely high and where the sun shines with regularity and intensity.

Twelve years were spent by the inventor upon his machine before he applied for patents upon it. It is characterized by great simplicity in its construction and principles.

The heat gathering device is very simple, says the St. Louis Republic, neither lenses nor mirrors being used. Ordinary window glass, placed over insulated troughs, through which water runs, allows the sun to penetrate and become absorbed in the liquid. This absorbed heat accumulates, as it cannot escape, because of the insultation, until it has reached the point necessary, when it is conducted to the vaporizer to perform the same function that exhaust steam does in the regular steam engines. The delivery of heat is made continuous by an arrangement of the troughs.

The temperature selected as being the most feasible is from 140 to 200 degrees Fahrenheit.

The inventor claims for his invention that the heat of the sun can be delivered in large quantities to the vaporizer of the low-temperature engine, and that it will operate in partly cloudy days and in large installations as well as in small ones. He also claims that heat can be stored for night use and to help out on cloudy days.

As the operating medium for the low-temperature engine the inventor has selected sulphur dioxide, which boils at 140 degrees Fahrenheit. To the boiler of this engine, the mechanism of which is precisely the same in all its features of construction as the steam engine, the heat collected by the heating device is delivered.

While the theory of the low-temperature engine is several years old, several varations of it being in use in Europe, the credit of employing a practical method of utilizing the heat of the sun for its operation is claimed for Inventor Willsie. It is also claimed for sulphur dioxide that it is one of the cheapest of operating mediums, and that it may be used over and over again, with but a slight loss from leakage.

For Sale—Tread Power.

Can use one, two or three horses, suitable for grinding corn on cob, sawing wood, shredding fodder, chopping hay or straw—in fact anything power may be attached to. The machine is almost new, in thorough repair and will be sold at a bargain. Farm work requiring use of horses operating it and the installation of a gas engine to take its place is our reason for offering it for sale.

A CHRISTMAS GAMBLE

..... By .....

ETHEL WARRINGTON

Copyright, 1903, by Ethel Warrington

Fishing up crumbs from the bottom of several pockets, I scraped together enough tobacco to roll a cigarette and, lighting it, puffed grateful wreaths, inhaled deeply and exhaled slowly. Hunger for food is bad enough in its way, but, honestly, up to a certain point, say twenty-four hours, I had rather go without food than without tobacco. But on this Christmas day the twenty-four limit on eating had passed some hours before, and just then I wanted food worse than I did tobacco.

Of course there was a chance of ringing in at one of the free feeds which the Salvation Army give the poor on Christmas, but some one would be sure to ask questions about my clothes, and, despite my hunger, I had a good measure of pride about me yet. If the worst came to the very worst, I could go to a pawnshop and exchange my suit of clothes for one of poorer quality and get a dollar or two to boot. But if I expected to get back on my feet the clothes were necessary to help me put up a "good front," and I was resolved to wait a few hours more before I made the plunge. I was waiting on the corner of the square, puffing reflectively at my cigarette and eying the warmth and light of the restaurant across the way enviously. I did not have on an overcoat, but the weather was not so bitterly cold but that this omission might be overlooked, and the rest of my clothes were fairly presentable.

With this in mind it occurred to me that I might step boldly into the restaurant, order a luxurious dinner, eat it, confess that I could not pay for it and take the consequences. It might get me into jail, but there were worse fates than spending a time in the city prison, and the morality of the act I never called into question. The motto of the hungry man is to fill his stomach, and I felt that I could make the restaurateur's loss good at some future time.

"Can you oblige me with a light?"

I turned and saw a middle aged man behind me, with an unlighted but half consumed cigar between his fingers, and managed to fish up a match for him.

"Thanks," he said monosyllabically, puffing away. He did not move on, but continued to scrutinize me very closely. I paid no attention to him, but continued to smoke.

"Waiting for some one?" he asked, politely enough.

"No," said I coldly.

"Broke?"

I looked at him again, and, angered by his curiosity, and his readiness in guessing my true state, I answered sharply that it was none of his business whether I was broke or not.

"Then you are broke?"

"Yes, if the knowledge will do you any good. I don't want any help from you."

"Hungry?"

"Will you kindly go to blazes?" I answered.

"Needn't get mad about it. Fellow feeling ought to make you more tolerant. I'm hungry too."

"The mischief you are!" said I, astonished. His clothes were fairly good, but I noticed that he wore neither watch chain nor scarfpin and leaped to the conclusion that he, like myself, was trying to keep up a "good front" in the hope of better days. "You must pardon me for my brusqueness," I added. "You see, I had no idea you and I were in the same boat and thought maybe you were going to offer me charity."

"Wouldn't accept charity, eh? Well, you are right; it is galling. But how would you go to get a square meal?"

"Just this side of the penitentiary," I answered, briefly and to the point.

The answer seemed to please him, for he chuckled and said:

"Mind taking a gambler's chance at the penitentiary?"

"No; I will take a chance at anything," I answered.

Then he unfolded to me a plan. Both of us being pretty well dressed, we could enter the restaurant and order dinner without arousing suspicion. This we would do, and after eating our dinner in leisure we would toss a coin—a dollar, not a coin, for neither of us had a coin, but we would draw toothpicks or straws or something—to decide who was to pay for the meal. The winner would get up and bid goodby to his friend, whom he would leave with the check and the prospect of the "pen." Of course the thing was hardly honest, but I can only plead that I was very hungry indeed. We went in.

Of all the dinners I have ever eaten in my life I think I enjoyed that one most. We turned up our noses at the regular table d'hote and ordered lavishly from the card, beginning with a clear soup and working down to the coffee by gradual and thoroughly delightful stages. We did not go in heavily for wines, but contented ourselves each with a modest pint of a fine old burgundy that when opened perfumed all its surroundings with the delicious aroma of its long imprisoned southern sunshine. As I ordered it I noticed that the waiter's "Bien, monsieur," was more heartfelt than usual and that his respect for me had risen immensely. It cost just a little more than double the price of champagne, but that did not weigh with either of us. We were like multimillionaires in one respect—we could not afford to deny ourselves anything we fancied.

We did not carry on much conversation, as the dinner was a solemn affair, but my companion led me out a little on my past record and my prospects for the future. I told him the truth—that I had come to New York with high hopes of establishing myself in the practice of a consulting engineer; that I had met with some success in the practical part of my profession in the west, but that my fame did not seem to have reached New York, and that, dollar by dollar, I had seen all of my little capital eaten up in the expenses of living. Pride had made me keep up the fight. Of himself my companion told nothing.

The old song says that "the best of friends must part." Everything comes to an end, and by and by we could eat no more. In unspoken desire to postpone the inevitable we lingered long over coffee and then over brandy and a couple of excellent cigars. It was pitch dark by now, and from where we were sitting we could see the trees of the square standing up as long black shadows and the lights of numberless hansoms patrolling Fifth avenue.

Then we looked at each other, and my new found acquaintance took two toothpicks in his hand, broke the end off one of them, shuffled them together and extended his hand toward me, the even ends of the toothpicks just showing. At random I chose one; he opened the hand, and I had won.

The waiter had watched the whole proceeding in some little amusement and was hovering in the neighborhood with the check; therefore I could not show my relief. But I could not help looking my friend squarely in the eye and noting that he was a game loser. Not by the quiver of a lash did he betoken anything amiss.

"I guess I'll have to pay this," he said quietly. "What's your hurry? Think I'll sit here and smoke a fresh cigar."

It was very well done, but I said something about having an engagement at the Waldorf and waved aside the waiter's offer to call me a cab. At the door I turned around to catch one more glimpse at my late vis-a-vis. He was laughing and beckoned me to come back. I went out of curiosity.

"Here, Pierre," he called to the waiter, "you know me, don't you?"

"Certainement, monsieur. Vous etes M. Gramercy."

"And I am good for the price of a dinner or two?"

"Mais, oui, monsieur; a thousand times."

"Then, for goodness' sake, young man, sit down!" he said, motioning me to my chair. "Do you know who I am now?"

I had seen his picture often enough in the newspapers and elsewhere. I do not know why I had not recognized him at first, since he was Dorothy's uncle and well known to the general public because of his wealth and eccentricities, though I had never seen him before in the flesh.

"Young man," he said, "I like your gameness. You never turned a hair when we drew straws, or, rather, toothpicks, to see which of us was going to the penitentiary. I think you will do. I seem to have heard your name before somewhere."

"I have the honor to be engaged to your niece," I said quietly.

"Exactly. Well, you can't very well get married until you get a job of some kind, so I suppose you might as well go to work for me. A young man with your nerve can always be made useful. Pierre, you will find my auto on the Broadway side. Have it brought around to the Twenty-sixth street entrance. My friend is going home with me."

Some Curious Heaven Ideas.

The natives of Botocudes, one of the hottest regions of the earth, believe that heaven will be a land of cool streams and shady groves entirely cleared of all underbrush and cacti! All desert dwellers, it is said, die expecting to awake in a wooded land supplied bountifully with cold water. You will remember, if you have ever read books of arctic travel, that all natives of the frozen north have paradise pictured as a land of warm sunshine, with glowing fires overhung with pots of boiling whale's blubber and easeful couches of fur scattered here and there.

The Caroline islanders, who are passionately fond of liquor, but who are in mortal dread of breaking their necks by falling from one of the millions of cliffs with which their islands abound, believe that paradise will be a land as level as a floor, where one can get drunk and not be in constant dread of cracking his cervical vertebrae.

WHAT THE TEACHER SHOULD BE

By Dr. WILLIAM MAXWELL, Superintendent of Schools, New York City

A TEACHER should have the ability to pick out essentials and DISREGARD the other things. That is the only solution of the problem of the so called overcrowded courses of study. THE FAULT LIES ONLY WITH THE TEACHERS. Those in authority should discover a person's qualifications before they give permission to teach. Applicants for a teacher's license should be persons who intend TO DEVOTE THEIR LIFE TO TEACHING. It is all too frequent that young men take up teaching simply as a makeshift until something can be found that will bring in more money. And it is not unusual to find young women who think that they will teach a year or two until the right young men come along to take them from the burden and care of the schoolroom. Teaching is a high and holy calling, and no one should enter it unless willing to devote all of his or her energy, soul and time to it.

No work, I presume, is more nerve racking than teaching, and it needs good health as well as strong will and strong mental powers. A person afflicted with serious physical or nervous trouble is by just so much incapacitated to do good work as a teacher. A TEACHER SHOULD BE THE MODEL OF HIS CLASS. If he is irritable he is not the proper person to teach children; if he is a cripple he cannot lead in the exercises, and by just so much he fails in his ability as a teacher.

Sound, extensive, accurate scholarship is the second quality that a man or woman should have who intends to teach. The public schools are established for the purpose not merely of giving the elements of a literary education, BUT TO DEVELOP THE FULLEST EFFICIENCY, individual and social, of every citizen. This is realized by bringing each child into harmony with his environment. His mind must be brought into contact with the great possessions of the race—our intellectual inheritances. However, it is not enough that a teacher knows something of these inheritances. He must possess industry, courage and, above all, SIMPLE MINDED DEVOTION to duty.

Professional training should also be acquired before the active work of teaching begins. The applicant should be an expert physical trainer, that he or she may lead the exercises with which the intellectual tasks of the children must be relieved. A teacher should understand children's games—not only theoretically, BUT PRACTICALLY. There is no surer way to get in close touch with your pupils than by engaging in their games.

The time has passed when all education was considered to come from the printed page. Now it is the theory that the hand and eye, as well as the mind, must also be trained. Therefore the teacher of today should be an EXPERT in manual training. It is essential for a man teacher especially to be at once an athlete and a mechanic.

The best use to which a teacher's study of psychology can be put is to a keen, accurate observation of children. He should know how to test a pupil's sight and hearing. He should be able to tell if any special physical exercises are harmful or beneficial. He should have the capacity to gauge a pupil's power of perception, retentiveness, judgment and reasoning. He should possess the insight to discover SPECIAL APTITUDES in children that he may advise them as to their future life work. It is my favorite theory that schools would be of more economic worth if TEACHERS could advise the pursuits for scholars to follow.

THERE IS NO ECONOMIC WASTE COMPARED WITH THE WASTE OCCASIONED BY SETTING PEOPLE AT WORK THEY ARE NOT FITTED FOR.

The Universality Of Stock Gambling

By THOMAS P. PETERS, Brooklyn Editor

DON'T think that speculating in Wall street is not widespread. IT IS ALMOST UNIVERSAL. I will venture to say that few have kept out of the market. Wherever the daily paper goes, wherever the telegraph or the telephone reaches, you will find the broker's office, with the blackboard and its mystic figures and its ostensible connections with a floor firm. The town may be of only 2,000 population, still it is very apt to have AT LEAST ONE BROKER. The poet was wont to sing of the simplicity of the farmer. The artist was wont to picture him at night, after his chores were done, sitting about the stove in the crossroads store, talking of the crops and of subjects usually as old as the civil war. BUT THAT IS NOT THE FARMER OF TODAY. Now, when his chores are done, he puts on his store clothes and rides over to the village station and gets his evening paper and turns at once to the stock page, or he calls up his broker on the store telephone and asks to be informed how Amalgamated Copper closed today or what the price of February wheat was at Chicago. He is not the simple rustic he could once have been called. He is the business man, deep in the gambling called speculation. INTO ALL WALKS OF LIFE HAS THIS GAMBLING GONE.

I have an intimate friend, once very well off, now working hard for a small pittance and his family greatly reduced in circumstances. SPECULATION DID IT. I know a barber, once prosperous, now living on his brother's farm up the Hudson river somewhere. He went into Steel common when it was paying 12 per cent upon the investment. No more dividends were declared after he bought. He lost about $800 and his little business was sacrificed. I know a widow whose earnings have gone the same way.

THE GREAT GAMBLING FEVER HAS BURNED INTO THESE HOMES AND LEFT ONLY THE BARE WALLS STANDING.

UNEARTHINC HERCULANEUM.

Few among great modern undertakings make a stronger appeal to the imagination than the proposal to mine from its buried depths the Roman city of Herculaneum that was overwhelmed in the year A. D. 79, at the same time that Pompeii was covered with cinders and ashes. Herculanuem was a city of splendid villas, a center of wealth and culture, bearing, it has been said, about the same relation to the city of Rome that Newport bears to New York. It was a summer resort city of palaces that housed the very finest examples of Greek and Roman art, both in painting and in sculpture. It is believed that everything in Herculaneum has been perfectly preserved, even to the fabrics and the paintings, as the material that covered the city was a wet conglomerate that served to enfold and preserve, but not to destroy. It is assumed that a complete excavation will reveal to the world a beautiful city 1,800 years old, and in the exact form and setting, with the houses standing just as they were, with the kitchen arrangements, the sleeping-rooms, the furniture, the wall decorations—everything just as the overwhelming catastrophe caught Herculaneum in all its pride and glory eighteen centures ago.

Pompeii was buried on an average of less than twenty feet; Herculaneum at from seventy to eighty feet. Pompeii was a rural town, with few costly houses. After the eruption the tops of many of the dwellings were exposed, and most of the treasures removed. But Herculaneum, with the exception of one or two vials, is practically untouched since the day it was buried. The proposed excavation will not only entail an enormous monetary cost, but be an engineering feat requiring most careful methods of procedure. The modern city of Resina is built upon the ancient site, and the excavating of the buried city will require tunneling processes that may be dangerous to the town that is seventy feet above. It may become necessary to construct supporting walls and arches if the underground city is to be completely cleared and made to shine with electric light as though lit by the light of day.

A great international scheme is now being organized for the unearthing of this splendid ancient Greek and Roman city—more Greek in its art and civilization, it is said, than Roman. Prof. Charles Waldstein, Slade professor of fine arts of the University of Cambridge, England, and formerly a director of the American School at Athens, is endeavoring to form something like an international syndicate which shall undertake to finance the great undertaking. He is understood to be acting with written indorsement from the King of Italy. His addresses in this country are attracting much interest. President Roosevelt has given the scheme unhesitating commendation. No definite estimate as to probable cost of the proposed excavation has been given out, though it is conceded that the cost will be enormous—so great that the Italian government is not willing, unaided, to undertake it. It is not to be doubted, however, that modern engineering skill, backed by modern wealth, will solve the fascinating problem of unearthing this splendid buried city.

A NUMBER of well known Democrats of Montgomery county, Md., met at Rockville a few days ago and formed a political organization to be known as the "Jefferson Party." Mr. George S. Krouse, who presided at the meeting, made a short address explaining the object to be for the purpose of forming a party whose principles will be so thoroughly grounded on the bedrock of Democracy that men will no longer remain in doubt as to the position to be taken by the party upon any question. Those at the head of the movement say the county will be thoroughly organized.

As a general rule the public highways throughout this county are good but State aid is necessary to better their condition. We call attention to the fact that the last Legislature appropriated two hundred thousand dollars to be expended on the public roads and this county is entitled to a share thereof if wanted. The manner of proceeding to get a portion of this fund is in two ways; The County Commissioners, or any number of real estate owners owning real estate bordering on not less than a mile of public road way and who are willing to bear ten per cent of the cost of the improvements can institute proceedings to secure a portion of the fund for the aforesaid purpose and under the law steps must be taken in that direction before the first day of March, next. Now while we have good roads, and while the wealth of the county is considerable there is no denying the fact that the public highways can be made better and while we are not rich, we should not be too proud to accept any good thing that may come along. We suggest therefore that the public authorities look further into the matter and whatever good is to come from the law let us have our share. When the law was first passed it was thought to be unconstitutional but that question is no longer a matter of doubt. It has been decided that the State owns the public highways and can repair its own property.

Death of Joseph Irons.

The following notice of the death of Joseph Irons has been contributed to this paper by one of the acquaintances of the deceased:

Joseph Irons, a native of Garrett county, Maryland, died January 19th, 1905, in his 86th year, at the home of his son John near Wasungo, Indian Territory. Interment was made in the Silverdale cemetery, Kansas, near the former home of his son, fifteen miles from the place of his death. His daughter, Mrs. Yager lives in Oklahoma.

Deceased is the last survivor of a large interesting family reared on the farm now owned by George Steyer, at Stever station on the W. Va. C. railroad.

In early life he married a daughter of the late Judge William Harvey, of Deer Park. After marriage he located on a farm now owned by William Riley.

After several year's residence here, his wife died when the two children were quite young. In after years he bought a farm in Ryan's Glade, and resided there until 1889, when he sold his farm to Abraham King. Shortly after he went west and lived with his son until death. "Uncle Joe", as he was generally called, had characteristics worthy of emulation. He believed what was worth doing was worth doing well. He was noted for his good judgment in constructing public roads. He superintended the building of the road from Mt. Lake Park to the top of Backbone mountain. He also was supervisor for all the roads in Dist. No. 8 for a number of years. During his long life he maintained his integrity, and built himself a character for truth and justice. Always of a genial disposition and loved for his many sterling qualities of heart and hand, and when he approached the evening of his existence he could say he trusted in God, and preserved his faith in Him to be his staff in the final journey. A CRY FOR "HELP."

A Correspondent, Writing from Deer Park, Sends Up a Wail.

A correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, writing from Deer Park, and signing himself "G. W. H." contributed the following to that paper recently:

"It is almost impossible to obtain the services of persons qualified for household work in Garrett county at the present time. During the summer, when Deer Park, Oakland, Mountain Lake Park and Loch Lynn are in full operation, the scarcity is not so apparent, because Washington and Baltimore furnish a great many who are able and willing to do the work; but just as soon as the summer is ended and resident families begin to look about for winter help it is impossible to secure the services of anyone. Repealing the Chinese Exclusion act would remove all these difficulties, and those who prefer to sit with folded hands could indulge in it to their heart's content. That would be one form of relief.

"I have had six cooks in as many weeks," said an Oakland resident on Saturday. "In the first place I find the greatest difficulty in obtaining a cook and the next trouble is to get her to remain. I heard of a woman in Fairmont and I telegraphed for her to come by the very first train. When she arrived she wished it understood that she was not to go into the dining room at all, nor was she to do any washing whatever. As we had been without a cook for a week, she was engaged. She continued in service only five days."

"The unwillingness of persons to perform housework is growing every day. The mistaken notion prevails that it is menial. Relief could be had if something could be done to prevent immigrants from remaining in the large cities upon reaching our shores. The columns of The Sun have shown that quite a large number of persons in New York who are recent arrivals from the other side are without employment. Now if the Maryland Board of Immigration could bring into Garrett county, the youngest and the largest county in Maryland, some of the immigrants landing at Locust Point the scarcity of help would be materially diminished and our troubles in this respect would vanish. Garrett county has plenty of room for desirable immigrants and indeed, any who are willing to work. Land is cheap and there is plenty of it. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad passes through it, making it within easy access of good markets. G. W. H."

DAVIS COAL & COKE CO. IN COURT.

Was Contending For Tract of Land In Garrett County.

The case of Michael Dailey vs. Isaac Adams Wagner, A. H. Tibbets and the Davis Coal and Coke Company, was called yesterday in the circuit court, having been removed here from Garrett county. Mr. T. J. Peddicord, of Oakland, and Mr. Ferdinand Williams, of Cumberland, represented the plaintiff and Mr. G. S. Hamill of Oakland, and Mr. B. A. Richmond, of Cumberland, the defendants. Just as the case was ready for trial the lawyers agreed upon a settlement and a juror was withdrawn and the case closed upon an agreement filed.

The action grew out of the fact that the Davis Coal and Coke Company trespassed upon Military lot No. 3843, of which Dailey claims to be the owner, having received a patent for it from the state of Maryland in October, 1898. The defendants claim that the land in question is the property of the coal company and has been so for a number of years. In 1863 the Preston Coal and Iron Company, which then owned lots Nos. 38,41 3843, conveyed them to Boyce and Real, who named the three lots the "Price Farm," and in 1880 sold the property to the Maryland Union Coal Company by deed in which was set out that the land known as the "Price Farm" was to be conveyed, and then further described the land, calling for lots 3841 and 3842 and ommitted to name 3843. The company took the land as it was then and still is fenced in, which included lot 3843. The Maryland Union Coal Company, by an act of the legislature had its name changed to the Franklin Consolidated Coal Company and under that name conveyed the "Price Farm" to Henry G. Davis and Thomas Davis, who afterward conveyed it to the Davis Coal and Coke Company, the two last mentioned deeds containing the description which had omitted lot No. 3843.

Michael Dailey discovnred that lot No. 3843 was not in the deeds and as the Preston Iron and Coal Company was now a thing of the past, and had in no way disposed of that lot, concluded that it had escheated to the state and thereupon secured a patent from the state for it and claimed ownership by reason of his patent. The Davis Coal and Coke Company entered the lot in question and destroyed the growing crops and for this damages was asked.—Cumberland News.

TO RAISE THE BATTLESHIP MAINE

Preliminary Work With This in View Has Been Commenced.

Active preparations are about to be commenced in the construction of the big circular cofferdam which is to be sunk around the wreck of the battleship Maine as she reposes in the harbor of Havana. By a recent action of the Cuban Government the time for beginning the work has been extended to April 19, 1905, and that for the completion of the work to April 19, 1906. The contractor who will undertake the work is Joseph De Wyckoff, the managing director of the company, which was organized for the purpose. According to the Engineering News of recent issue, as nearly as can be learned from careful examinations of the wreck made with the aid of competent divers, about one-third of the battleship at the bow has been seriously injured, the other two-thirds remaining comparatively uninjured. It is the purpose of the company, first to remove the bodies of the sailors and their personal effects and then to make the undertaking a financial success by the recovery of all valuable articles, such as arm, cannon, coal, machinery, etc., and the uninjured part of the battleship itself. It is also proposed to admit visitors to the wreck after the cofferdam is pumped out, charging an admission fee; and after the ship is floated to exhibit it at the principal ports of the United States. It is also proposed to manufacture articles of brass, bronze and copper found upon the wreck into mementoes to be sold with certificates of American and Cuban officials as their genuineness. Sufficient material of all kinds will previously, however be set aside for the erection of the contemplated memorial Committee. Photographers offer large sums of the wreck from time to time as the water is being pumped out. The revenue which will be derived from these sources will be much more than sufficient to pay for the cost of building the necessary cofferdam and removing the wreck.

Should it be found possible to repair the damaged part of the vessel it will be placed on the floating dock at Havana and the battleship be completely repaired, when there will be for sale to some Government a complete battleship which originally cost the United States Government $5,000,000 to build and equip. The cofferdam will be truly circular in shape, with an inside diameter of 354 feet, thus providing a clearance of 15 feet at each end of the battleship.

Great Number of Catholics.

The official directory of the Catholic church in America has just been issued, and shows a total population of Catholics in the United States of 12,462,000. The figures for the Nation follow:

Clergy, 13,853; number of churches, 11,387; seminaries, 83; students, 3,926; colleges for boys, 791; for girls, 692; parochial schools, 4,235; children attending, 103,378; orphan asylums, 252; orphans, 37,822; charitable institutions, 987; occupants, 1,201,899.

For Thin Babies

Fat is of great account to a baby; that is why babies are fat. If your baby is scrawny, Scott's Emulsion is what he wants. The healthy baby stores as fat what it does not need immediately for bone and muscle. Fat babies are happy; they do not cry; they are rich; their fat is laid up for time of need. They are happy because they are comfortable. The fat surrounds their little nerves and cushions them. When they are scrawny those nerves are hurt at every ungentle touch. They delight in Scott's Emulsion. It is as sweet as wholesome to them.

Father and Son Are Both Promoted.

Promotion of an unusually high degree does not come to two in the same family at the same time, yet this is what happened in the Fitzgerald family last week. Thomas Fitzgerald, promoted from general superintendent to general manager of the Baltimore and Ohio, had hardly been notified of his new position, when his son, Thomas Fitzgerald, Jr., who is quite an electrical expert, was promoted to a high position with the Cincinnati Traction company. Thomas Fitzgerald, Jr., is perhaps the youngest man in such an advanced position, in railway circles. He is only 26, yet he has mastered many things in connection with street railways which older heads have striven for years to attain. In going to Cincinnati young Mr. Fitzgerald has given up his position as general manager of the Lexington (Ky.) Street Railway and Electric Light company, which position he has filled since April, 1903. He has made the change in order to go into a field where there are wider possibilities in railway management.

Death of Norman Jacobs.

Norman Jacobs, aged about eight-three years, residing in District No. 11, of this county, died on Friday, being survived by his son William H. Jacobs, Esq., a former member of the Maryland Legislature from this county. Mr. Jacobs was considered a wealthy man and resided with his son.

The Simple Life

BY

CHARLES WAGNER

President Roosevelt Says to the Author of it:

"I AM PREACHING YOUR BOOK TO MY COUNTRYMEN."

Will Begin Next Week as a Serial in this Paper

TO aspire to the simple life is to rightly aspire to the fulfilment of the highest human destiny. All the movements of humanity toward more justice and more light have been at the same time movements toward a more simple life. And the antique simplicity in arts, manners and ideas hold for us their incomparable value only because it has been able to give a powerful relief to some essential sentiments, to some fixed truths. We must love that simplicity and guard it piously. But he will have gone but the hundredth part of his road who holds to exterior forms, and who does not seek to realize the spirit. In fact, it is impossible for us to be simple in the same ways as were our forbears, and we can only remain so, or return to simplicity in the same spirit. We are walking in other paths, but the aim of humanity is fundamentally the same. It is always the polar star which directs the mariner, no matter whether he is embarked on a sailing ship or a steamer.

To advance towards this aim with all the means of which we can dispose is the most important thing, today as ever. And it is because we have often been drawn aside that we have confused and complicated our lives.

The merchant who refuses to adyertise, and doesn't let people know he is after his share of their business, will never put the catalogue houses to route. The catalogue fellows are busy right now spreading their literature and driving nails in the coffin of the merchant who is indifferent to the merits of judicious advertising, or hasn't the nerve to invest a little money in newspaper space. The big catalogue houses have built up their enormous trade wholly through advertising, and the only way the country merchant can successfully fight them is with their own weapons.

FOR TOWN BOOMING.

The Organization of A Progressive Commercial Club.

Many plans have been devised to further the interests of small towns and cities. The most common plan and the one which has proved the most successful is the organization of commercial clubs in which all business men of the community co-operate for the common good of all, says the Home Trade Advocate.

Commercial clubs are almost a necessity in any town where harmony is desired among the different business classes in the carrying out of plans for town improvement, securing of enterprises of various kinds and the general good of all. There is no reason why these clubs in their membership should be confined to the residents of the town.

The farmers in the neighborhood are as deeply interested in the success of town enterprises as are the business men of the place, or at least they should be, for what will help along the town toward prosperity will also help the farmer.

But in many localities there is sentiment that the interests of the farmer and the business men are not parallel. It is necessary that this feeling be obliterated as far as possible, because there is no logical foundation for it.

The better the town is the better the local market for the farmer's produce, the more equitable will be tax ation and the better education facilities. All these are matters that concern the farmer in the immediate neighborhood of the town.

Many business men feel that a membership in clubs organized for promotion of town industries should be confined to business men; that perhaps the farmer would not be in accord with the town resident in improvements. This is an error. It is lack of confidence in the good judgment of the average farmer.

Then again the farmer sometimes thinks that he is not welcome in an association of business men. There is no good reason why these sentiments should exist. It is only by a harmonious pulling together of the residents of the rural districts and the business men that the greatest good can be brought about for the home town.

The newspape rreaches everybody. It is the one agency which touches all the people all the time. The scholar cannot get along without it, the day laborer has it for his sole intellectual food. Rich, poor, wise, ignorant, young, old—everybody reads the newspaper, and it is the only form of literature of which this may be said. Thus the opportunity of the press is unlimited. It has the public ear. Is it any wonder, therefore, that national ideals are, consciously or unconsciously molded by the press?

The contract for the Masonic monument to be erected in Cumberland to the memory of Dr. Charles H. Ohr, past grand master, has been awarded to the J. B. Williams Company, Frostburg. It will be unveiled May 16. The monument will be of Barre granite, sarcophagus design. It will weigh 10 tons, stand 6 feet and have a base of about 6 by 4 feet, surmounted by a subbase containing in relief "Ohr". The central piece has four columns with handsomely carved capitals, supporting an imposing capstone engraved with Masonic emblems and the inscription, "Erected by the Masons of Maryland." The monument complete will have the appearance of a Masonic altar. On the die will be a bronze tablet, suitably inscribed.

Prospects Encouraging For a Petroleum Find.

The Piney Run Oil and Gas company have bored 1200 feet in their second test well near Sand Patch, three miles north of the location of the first well, near Finzel, Garrett county. The prospects are considered very fine. Mr. Patrick E. Finzel, general manager, met the directors of the company at the Hotel Rennert, Baltimore, Monday night, and displayed a sample of oil sand taken from the well. The driller and contractor both claim that the sample was as good as any found in any field. The same company are sinking a test well in Gilmer county, W. Va., having reached a depth of 200 feet.

A New-Old Merchant.

By reference to our advertising columns today it will be noticed that Mr. Arthur Thownshend, lately of the firm of S. S. Townshend & Son, has opened in the First National Bank building, his new stock of general merchandise. Mr. Townshend purchased his stock last week from the wholesalers and jobbers and those who patronized him will buy nothing but new, seasonable and fresh goods of the best quality.

Mr. Townshend, embarking in business for himself, is one of the new-old merchants of Oakland, having been engaged in the mercantile business here for a great many years with the firms of Davis & Townshend and S. L. Townshend & Son. His many friends wish him unbounded success in his venture.

RAIN AND SNOW OVER COUNTRY

Within Sixty Hours of 9 O'clock P. M. on the 19th of February.

Rev. Irl R. Hicks, the St. Louis weather forecaster, predicts the following program for February:

The First Storm Period embraces 1st to the 6th, having its center in the 3rd. Falling barometer, rising temperature, shifting winds to southward, and growing cloudiness will begin in western parts early in this period. As these conditions move eastward, rain, turning to snow over northerly sections, may be expected. Antistorm conditions will spread eastward to the Atlantic before the oncoming of the next storm period.

The Second Storm Period is central on the 8th and 9th. On and touching the 8th look for reaction to much warmer, with possible thunder and rain southward. Rain will turn to squalls of wind and snow in many sections by the 9th and 10th.

The Third Storm Period will extend from the 12th to the 16th. A marked atmospheric depression will start in the West early in this period, and with this low barometer look for the prompt vigorous storms of rain and snow to spread eastward during the 13th to 16th. A rising barometer and February cold wave will follow.

The Fourth Storm Period is central on the 19th, 20th and 21st. The probabilities are that the first of a series of West India storms will appear in the waters adjacent to the Gulf rejoins. Gales and violent tidal waves will touch many coasts exposed to storms, in many parts of the globe. The barometer will drop to low reading over most parts of the country, and general rain and snow will visit the country within 60 hours of 6 o'clock p. m. on the 19th. High gales and a sweeping blizzard out of, and over the northwest, should be counted imminent probabilities, all followed by high barometer and far-reaching cold wave.

The Fifth Storm Period is central on the 26th and covers the 24th to 28th. By the close of February, conflicts between boreal and equinoctial forces naturally produce weather "irritations," constantly inducing spits and squalls of rain and snow. Such tendencies will be decidedly increased during the last four days of the month. The barometer will fall and wide storm areas of rain and snow will make transits over the country during the 26th, 27th and 28th. While these storms are still in progress in central and eastern sections, high barometer and clearing, cold weather will be pressing on the rear out of the west and north.

Suit for Divorce.

Mrs. Amelia E. Poling, by her attorney of record, has entered suit in the Circuit Court for Garrett county praying for a divorce from her husband, Isaac Poling, to whom she was married in the year 1873. To this union were born seven children. In the bill the plaintiff alleges abandonment and petitions the court to allow her to resume her maiden name, Amelia Elizabeth Shirly.

Furnace Burned Out.

Owing to the lack of water or some other cause yet unexplained, the boiler attached to the heating plant at the Catholic church in Oakland, was rendered useless by the burning out on Saturday night of several sections of steam generator, hence the church was extremely cold for service Sunday. Repairs are expected to be completed yet this week which will restore it and services will be conducted as usual.

The Ex-Transgressor

By GEORGE THELBERT WALSH

Copyright, 1904, by George Ethelbert Walsh

KID DILWORTH was an unusual man. Without attempting to analyze him I should say that he was unusual because of certain mixed qualities that might have made him famous outside of Rountree. It is true he was conspicuous in Rountree, but not of the kind that spells fame. One thing, his ambition didn't turn in the right direction, and he was too much obscured by certain inherited traits that you couldn't hold him responsible for. He was unassuming, too, and you couldn't help liking him for that.

Budd Brainard said that Dilworth was a lazy, good for nothing horse thief before he was reformed. But Budd had a grudge against him which didn't have a chance to cool in that Arizona temperature.

Dilworth reformed when he struck the trail of a miserable little preacher sent down there to save himself from an early consumptive's grave. The Kid took a fancy to him and helped him to keep order when he tried to preach, and when he died he made all Rountree turn out to his funeral. It was the greatest funeral you ever saw in that region. It just made one think that we were all in love with the dead chap. But we weren't. We were sort of hypnotized by Dilworth. Somehow the mantle of Elijah had fallen on the Kid's shoulders.

Leastwise he assumed that it had, and he made us believe it. We couldn't deny it, and we couldn't affirm it, and what you can't affirm or deny you'd better leave alone. So we accepted it while under the spell of the moment. Budd Brainard said "Amen!" and the Kid took it right and pretended not to see the mockery in Budd's tone and added:

"Amen and amen!"

Budd looked kind of confused and asked:

"Does the Kid take it earnest? Ain't he got brains enough to see the p'int of the joke?"

Dilworth overheard, but he chose to assume not, and he dispersed the funeral procession with a wave of his hand and a highfaluting sort of announcement that he'd hold meeting next Sabbath morning at 11 in the back part of the Yellow Coyote saloon.

Coyote Mike gave the Kid the use of his back room for service, knowing that he would profit by the crowd that would assemble in the front room. All Rountree was there, every one burning with thirst and curiosity. Dilworth held the service alone; we didn't interrupt him. It was none of our business if he wanted to play preacher.

Now, an ordinary man would have been scared to death by the popping of guns and corks in the Yellow Coyote saloon that morning, but the Kid only prayed and sang the louder behind his closed doors. When the meeting was over he came out looking sorrowful and downcast.

"Why didn't some of you boys come in?" he asked, pleading-like. "I know you would have enjoyed it. Next Sabbath morning we'll have a large audience."

Some of us tried to snicker, but somehow we couldn't. We just felt that hypnotizing spell come over us again. Budd Brainard started the procession from the saloon. Dilworth stood and eyed us sadly. He didn't seize upon any one until it came Buck

BUDD BRAINARD SAID "AMEN!"

Grey's turn to scoot out of the door. Then he just stretched forth a hand and said:

"Buck, the Lord wants you."

Ordinarily Buck could handle a six shooter quick enough and could laugh at death in almost any form, but he just trembled all over now and wilted. We saw him draw back into the shadow of the saloon with the Kid and listen.

Coyote Mike's back room had an audience of two the following Sabbath, and the popping of corks and guns in front was not so frisky as usual. There was an atmosphere of quietness about the place which oppressed us. Budd Brainard finally said:

"I'm going to leave this place before that horse thief provokes me into shooting him. I'll do it if he"—

Budd couldn't finish, for the Kid was in our midst and at the door ahead of any one. He just looked over Budd's shoulder and said:

"We've decided to raise funds to build a meeting house in Rountree. We need it bad, boys, for the back room of the Yellow Coyote is small, and it won't hold our audience much longer."

This naturally provoked Coyote Mike to anger, for he would lose trade. But before he could speak up his opinion the Kid had him by the hand.

"You'll help, for you have profited more than anybody in Rountree over the sinfulness of man. We'll let you off with $500 now, but we'll come back for more later. Next!"

Coyote Mike never protested, for the Kid had him down for the full amount, with his signature at the foot, before he could recover from his astonishment. Budd Brainard once more started for the door, saying under his breath: "Hang him! He'll befuddle me next with his tomfoolery!"

The Kid replied sorrowfully enough, holding open the door for Budd: "We'll take your subscription for the new meeting house another time. The Lord can bide his time."

"So can I!" snapped Budd. "And when my time comes we'll settle all past scores. Understand?"

After that the Kid had opposition in building his new meeting house. Rountree didn't need such an institution, for it hadn't thrown off its swaddling clothes, and it was in need of more saloons than churches. But the Kid showed his peculiar inherited traits by not being downhearted over the failure of his scheme to save the souls of the Rountree citizens in a real, genuine church. There were, of course, some who followed him and believed in him, but not many.

When things didn't come fast enough his way Dilworth said something about "buckling on the armor of the Lord and fighting for the right." We took this sort of talking figuratively until one day he waylaid Mexican Pete and toted him off to his house to convert him. Pete was a sinner if there ever was one—horse thief, drunkard and gambler. If the Kid could convert him, along with Buck Grey, he would prove a better man than any of his predecessors in the ministry.

Pete didn't show up again for a week. Some said he was dead drunk, and others hinted that the Kid had made way with him. But he was all right, except that he looked scared and pale when he appeared at the Yellow Coyote bar again.

"Have one, Pete?" said Budd. "Make it anything."

Mexican Pete shook his head and whispered, "I—do you mind if we call it sarsaparilla?"

I thought Budd would fall to the floor, but he just gasped and turned to Coyote Mike. "You hear?"

Then when Coyote Mike gurgled out an inarticulate reply Budd added wrathfully: "This is going too far! What's the matter with us, anyway, to let that little reformed horse thief come here and henpeck us? Why don't you close up his mouth, Mike? If you don't he'll close up your saloon. Well, you're the finest lot of blasted, idiotic dummies that I ever see! I'll be hanged if I don't shake off the dust of Rountree for good! It's too preachy here for me. I'm stifling, asphyxiating. Sarsaparilla for Mexican Pete! Huh! Take him home and give him the nursing bottle! I'll go camping on the trail of that Kid. He's a horse thief, a self confessed one, and ought to die."

Usually Budd lived up to his word, and we expected developments. But in Rountree you can never tell where lightning will strike. It was an even gamble on Budd and the Kid.

Considering everything, I was a little confused when both turned up as serenely unconcerned as ever. Budd said nothing about the Kid, and the Kid always purposely avoided speaking of his old side partner of the days before the measly little preacher chap brought trouble to Rountree.

Then the best citizens began to lose horses, stolen from right under their noses. A horse thief hadn't been hung in Rountree for six months. Every one felt himself a self constituted committee to run the thief to ground, but somehow he was too wary for us, and we just bucked our heads against a stone wall in vain.

Budd Brainard swore over the bar of the Yellow Coyote that if the thief touched his horse he'd run him to ground within forty-eight hours. Then, just to show how little he cared for Budd's threat, the thief trailed behind him that night and led his horse off to parts unknown.

"We'll have the noose around him this time," some one says, knowing Budd for a bad man when outraged.

But the excitement didn't come off. About half the horses of Rountree were stolen before the citizens organized. Then they held a meeting to consider things. It was the Kid who first let light in on the subject. After all the others had had their say he put up a clincher in this wise:

"Seems to me we need to stimulate our civic pride a little by offering a money reward for the horse thief, dead or alive, but mostly alive. A little reward will do wonders sometimes. Remember once when I was nearly corralled by— But that was in the days before I was converted, and it makes me sad to think of it. I won't recall it."

The Kid had a sorrowful way of looking out of his mournful eyes which affected us so that we all hastened to agree with him.

"I'll put up a hundred on that reward," said Budd Brainard.

"And I'll cover it with the same," added Coyote Mike.

"Just double the amounts, gentlemen, and I'll cover them both," the Kid said, being game to the core.

In half an hour a purse of $2,000 was handed over to Coyote Mike to hold for the successful man. The Kid eyed the money with wistful eyes.

"Seeing that I started the fund growing," he said slowly, "I might have the privilege of modifying the terms of the reward."

There were some grunts of disapproval, but the Kid continued:

"I don't think you'll object to giving the captor of the horse thief a chance to say what shall be done with him or the opportunity to pull the rope first if he's hung."

"I'M HIM—THE HORSE THIEF."

"No objection," said Budd, with an oath. "A good idea! I want that reward and the first pull on the rope."

"Or the first shot if you decide to shoot him?" added the Kid.

"Yes, the first shot or the first pull. But it will be a pull."

"But if you decide to let him go scot free we can't interfere; that's a part of the bargain."

"Yes, a part of the bargain!" roared Budd at the joke. "I'll let him go scot free, but he won't go far."

"Well, gentlemen, we understand each other," the Kid announced. "The one who claims the reward has all to say about what shall be done with the thief. Then I'll have him here tomorrow noon."

A sudden suspicion of the truth dawned on us. The Kid was going to save the thief's life. It was another one of his freaks. After exacting a promise from us to let the captor decide the man's fate he was ready to expose the thief.

"No, you don't!" shouted Budd Brainard. "I'll camp on your trail every minute of the day and night, and I'll be in at the end. I'll have half the reward and half the say."

True to his word, Budd followed the Kid around like a shadow. They ate and slept together. The Kid didn't resent Budd's presence, but sought mightily to work upon his spiritual nature. I think if the watch had been extended to a fortnight Budd would either have been converted or stampeded for new grounds without half the reward.

The Kid appeared to make no unusual efforts to hunt down the thief. He talked religion to Budd most of the time and prayed for him the rest. Budd looked pretty pale and haggard the next morning; he was wild eyed and desperate. But when it came time for the Kid to redeem his promise a look of hope entered Budd's eyes. His vigil would soon end.

The Kid was the only collected one of the crowd assembled at Coyote Mike's saloon at five minutes past noon. Budd was fierce and anxious, showing the strain in his husky voice.

"Where is he?" he demanded hoarsely. "Where's your horse thief?"

"Don't hurry matters, Budd. I'm coming to that part of it. Does anybody here know who the thief is?"

There was a negative growl, even from Budd.

"Then I stand alone to claim the reward," the Kid added. "Coyote Mike will hold it in trust for the new meeting house. It will be enough to build it right away, and more."

There was no comment. Nobody cared what the Kid did with the money if he could produce the horse thief.

"Understand, I'm to have the only say what shall be done with the man. You can trust me to deal rightly with him. Is there any objection?"

There was none audible, but plenty under the breath. Then the Kid did something to take their breath away. He stood up on a barrel and said:

"I'm him—the horse thief and the claimant of the reward. We needed the meeting house so badly that I had to do something." He paused. "And now we have the money."

There were several menacing movements in the direction of the belt, but the Kid forestalled the action by adding:

"The horses stolen are all in good condition down on Mexican Pete's ranch. He let me keep them there until you wanted them. Now we'll adjourn the meeting until I decide whether to hang or shoot the thief. If it's either one, Budd, I'll surrender my right and give you the first pull or shot."

But Budd had made a break for the door. He was still unconverted, and the Kid looked sorrowful. "But if the Lord can abide his time so can I," he murmured.

Opening For a Fuss And What Caused It

A NEW family had moved into the apartment on the first floor. Coincidently with the arrival of the new tenants a cat with a following of five or six half grown kittens moved in and took possession of an obscure corner in the hallway.

From the statements of parties most interested it appears that these animals began howling at or near 6 o'clock p. m. of the same day and kept it up without any intermission worth mentioning until 11 o'clock, at which hour a tall man wrapped in the folds of a dressing gown and wearing a pair of squeaking slippers was seen descending the stairway from the apartments on the second floor.

As he reached the bottom of the stairs a door leading into the apartments on the first floor opened, and a man with a skullcap and an angry countenance emerged.

"I don't know who you are," said the man in the dressing gown, "but my opinion is that you haven't got much humanity about you—if anybody should ride up in front of this building in an automobile and ask you!"

"I don't know who you are either," responded the other man, "but you can't have any worse opinion of me than I have of you—if some man should happen to write you a letter of inquiry about it!"

"Why don't you take those cats in and feed them?"

"Why don't you do it yourself?"

"The idea of half starving a lot of kittens and letting them yowl all night long and disturb everybody in the building"—

"It isn't disturbing you any worse than it's disturbing me. If you want those cats fed you can feed them."

"I'll show you how I'll feed them!" exclaimed the man in the dressing gown, striding over to the corner, gathering the animals up in his arms, taking them to the front door and depositing the bunch on the porch outside.

"What have you got to say now, sir?" he demanded, turning and facing the new tenant belligerently.

"Nothing, except thank you, sir."

"What? Aren't they your cats?"

"Not at all. I thought they were yours."

"Well, by the great horn! Say, my name's Rogers. What's yours?"

"Glad to know you, Mr. Rogers. My name is Hawkins."—Chicago Tribune.

A Lost Opportunity.

"Nice girl, eh?"

"Oh, yes; she's pretty enough, but she hasn't much sense. Why, she had a chance to marry me and refused."

Plumber Died Poor.

The man near the rear door of the street car was inveighing against plumbers to eager listeners, and he finally clinched his arguments by looking around in a defiant way and saying:

"Did any one of you ever know or hear of a plumber who died a poor man?"

"I know of one case," replied a man who had been reading his newspaper with seeming interest.

"Then let us hear it."

"It was the case of my own father, who was a plumber. He invested $17,000,000 in a steamboat line, and during a hurricane every single craft in the line went to the bottom. He died a year later, and he didn't have money enough to pay the undertaker's bill."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Sherman Starts for the Sea.

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

November 15, 1864

[Copyright, 1904, by G. L. Kilmer.]

"IF there's to be any hard fighting you'll have to do it," Sherman said to an officer whom he sent back from Georgia to Tennessee when starting from Atlanta on his famous march to the sea on Nov. 15, 1864. It is strange to find a fighting general turning his back on the enemy and leaving it to others to do the hard work. He knew that at that time there was no Confederate army in Georgia to oppose his march through to the sea. General Hood, the Confederate commander at Atlanta, had swung off westward toward Alabama and then northward, avoiding the army which Sherman kept in hand after the capture of Atlanta in September. Hood was aiming for Tennessee and actually threatening to invade Ohio and Illinois, perhaps carry the seat of war to the lakes and pounce down upon Cincinnati and Chicago.

Hood was Sherman's foe, the power in the south he had been sent to crush, but he had escaped from Atlanta and was foot loose for new enterprises. Military strategy demanded that Sherman settle with Hood before striking out on the trip to the sea, however promising that might be. His ultimate aim in that enterprise was to establish his base upon the Atlantic seaboard and get into direct communication with the Federal army under Grant, then hammering away at Petersburg and Richmond. He decided to lead in person the uneventful march which gave the nation the most popular war song in its history and leave to "Pap" Thomas the hard fighting in Tennessee.

Sherman planned to strike for Columbia, S. C., and to establish a base of supply at a point on the Atlantic coast convenient to that town. The old base at Chattanooga which had served the army while operating against Atlanta he abandoned from the start, intending that his troops should live off the rations carried with them and off the food found in the region traversed.

The state of Georgia, through which Sherman laid his route of march, was thoroughly hostile to the northern arms, and while Sherman did not look for opposition by any large force of Confederates he did not know what obstacles might be placed in the way of his march. Four possible places were named where he might strike the coast, according as the difficulties of his march deflected the course to be followed. In order to be prepared for emergencies he requested that the Federal fleets watch for his arrival near Charleston, S. C., near Savannah, Ga., and at Pensacola and Mobile.

A destination on the gulf would not be selected unless Sherman found his way barred to the Carolinas, but he proposed to destroy all the railroads connecting the gulf states with the Atlantic coast, thus cutting the Confederacy in two. Before cutting loose from the north for good and sending his last message over the old commercial telegraph line Sherman divided his forces into two armies, one to march for the sea, the other to head off General Hood in his audacious enterprise and defend the north and northwest from threatened invasion.

The army to march to the sea was divided into two columns, the right wing under General O. O. Howard and the left wing under General H. W. Slocum. Each wing comprised two corps of three divisions. A single division of cavalry marched with the column under the leadership of General Kilpatrick. The force, all told, numbered over 62,000 men. All the sick were sent north, the poor and weak animals weeded out from the draft teams and eight good horses given to each gun and caisson.

The troops carried on their persons and in wagons twenty days' rations, and the wagons carried 200 rounds of extra ammunition for each man and cannon in the array. As a further ration supply droves of beef cattle started out with the column, and did not grow less, as the route lay through Georgia's rich farming and grazing lands. Taken all in all, the army was ready to fight its way to the sea, although, as Sherman declared, there was little prospect that it would be called upon to battle for existence or the right of way.

Before leaving Atlanta Sherman saw to it that no future Confederate army would make that a rallying point. The elaborate defenses which had blown up during the siege, facing both north and south, were thoroughly razed, and all the workshops, mills and depots that could be serviceable to an army were destroyed.

Sixty thousand soldiers gathered at nightfall to witness this destruction, and with the accompaniment of music, the bands playing martial airs and operatic selections, the torch was applied to magazines of powder beneath the doomed structures and the sky was illuminated by brilliant spires and towers of flames. Leaving the smoking ruins behind, the soldiers took up the march the morning of Nov. 15, first casting away their last impedimenta. Sherman rode with the left wing, on the road to Augusta. Never a martinet in camp, he appeared on the march with a single staff officer and orderly and was easily approached by the soldier who had a case to present. "Uncle Billy" was a greeting which often reached his ears, and he saluted right and left the line officers and common soldiers whom he had met in camp. After the first day or two the soldiers began to look upon their trip as a picnic. Flankers guarded the line on either side, while mounted skirmishers rode far ahead. Foragers were sent out and then troops were expected to eat all that was brought to camp to save transportation. An exception was made when game roosters were found among the plunder. These were kept for sport and the less courageous fowls sent to the frying pan. On the march the gamecocks were carried under the arm of some soldier or allowed to perch, with a string tied to the leg, upon a cannon or caisson box.

The "foragers" or "bummers" set out each morning before daylight and rode in advance of the troops. They were armed, of course, to defend themselves from Confederates who might be on the scent of the same plunder. The natives usually buried their provisions, and it became an art to detect these subterranean storehouses. In case of a big find the foragers pressed into service farm carts and vehicles. One day a forager rode into the bivouac dressed in the faded uniform of a militia general of olden days, with a high hat and monstrous feather. Behind him came a family carriage laden with hams, sweet potatoes, game and sweetmeats, drawn by two horses, a mule and a cow.

Occasionally the columns would enter a region bare of supplies—that is to say, of luxuries—but the country was seldom so poor but that skillful hunters could unearth sweet potatoes and bacon. Usually the corn crop was good and unharvested. Wherever a gristmill could be found the troops ground their own meal, and if the mill was out of order, as was often the case, the clever Yankees could mend the gearing for temporary use. The negroes were ever ready to serve the Yankees, and it took but little coaxing to get the old mammies to turn out "co'n pone" by the bushel.

Then, too, there was excitement for the weary marchers. During the first stage the Confederate cavalry under General Joe Wheeler covered the territory in advance of both Slocum's and Howard's lines, and there were frequent skirmishes on the outposts. Occasionally the enemy's foragers had possession of the fat of the land and a struggle more ingenious and daring than bloody would take place. Escaping Yankee prisoners often drifted into the lines and told their wonderful stories of prison life. As the column marched on, all the railways were destroyed. Occasionally this work of destruction was resisted by the local authorities and even by armed militia. Sherman strove to avoid battle and was generally able to brush away opposition by a mere show of force.

With the army marching blindly on in unknown territory it took but little to produce that most exciting and ridiculous thing, an "army scare." Sometimes a rattled forager, riding back at a gallop and calling out danger, would bring a whole corps into battle line. Staff officers would dash down the road like mad, generals and colonels would shout orders, while sabers flashed from thousands of scabbards, muskets were brought to a carry, sergeants buzzed along the line, the flag was unfurled at each battalion and the line stood ready for battle. To the music of banging shells staff officers returned from the front, but it was soon over, the real or imaginary enemy flying at the sound of big guns, and the column soon fell into route, marching, but not fighting, "through Georgia."

Many of Them.

"You need not try to interrupt me, John Dehaven Skillimore," asserted the wife. "I am going to have the last word."

"Yes, my dear, you may have it," answered the husband. "But is it your intention to orate entirely through the dictionary? Why not deliver the last word and shut up—I mean, close the book—that is, figuratively spea"—

The Man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

SOME REASONS WHY PEOPLE ARE SETTLING IN MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA.

Because it is the best country known to the man of moderate means.
Because you will find a country of rich soil awaiting the settler.
Because there are uplands, prarieland, and alluvial river bottoms.
Because you can be certain of profitable returns from whatever you put into the soil.
Because the winter does not consume what the summer produces.
Because there are more and better opportunities for deversified farming than elsewhere.
Because the seasons are regular and no fear of crop failure.
Because the country is never scourged by cyclones and devastating storms and blizzards.
Because everything grown elsewhere can be produced here more abundantly.
Because truck farming is a success; products being early on the market obtain high prices.
Because no better fruit country is known, oranges, plums, peaches, pears, apples, grapes, strawberries, figs, pecans and other fully maturing.
Because there are more chances for profitable investment of capital than elsewhere in this country.
Because for healthfulness this section is unequalled on the face of the globe.
Because you have no long winter months to encounter, with no excessive dry heat in summer.
Because the climate is more uniform than elsewhere, no extremes of heat or cold.
Because you will find the as orderly communities as anywhere on this continent.
Because you will find the most open-hearted people on the globe.
Because education is paramount; public schools and churches of every denomiuation are to be found in all communities.
Because the railroad facilities of this section are unexcelled, a double tracked railroad traversing the entire length of both states.
Because really good lands are yet cheap.
Because the geographical location of these states gives them the best markets in the United States.

We secure land for home-seekers or for colonies. Write to-day for full particulars and letters from Northern farmers already located in the South.

The Jiu Jitsuite's Undoing

PHILETUS BROWN secured by mail
a jiu jitsu course.
He learned the way to use his strength with suddenness and
force
And how to swiftly call in play each muscular resource;
He learned to twist
His hand and wrist
And knock you down without so much as doubling up his fist.

When he was letter perfect in the art Philetus Brown
Became the fistic champion and terror of the town.
Before you knew that he had moved he had you falling down;
When his quick jerk
Got in its work
You thought you'd been where dynamite and other dangers lurk.

He took big Henry Billiger, who weighed three hundred pounds,
And slammed him here and there with ease across the baseball grounds,
And Henry's gasps of wonder were the only noted sounds.
Within a week
No one would speak
Of physical perfection—we were mighty mild and meek.

One day while Brown of brawn and brain in boastful accents talked
Joe Smithers sauntered up and said his old roan mule had balked.
Philetus hunched his shoulders, and toward that mule he walked.
Though slight and slim,
His look was grim,
And we in expectation hastened out and followed him.

Philetus Brown removed his coat, complacent, calm and cool,
And boldly seized the pendent tail of Joseph Smithers' mule,
Unheeding Joe's remark that he was acting like a fool.
A swish, a buzz,
That's all there was,
Except an interrupted "Here's what jiu jitsu does!"

Philetus Brown is out again. He hobbles with a crutch
And wraps himself with bandages—he's still too sore to touch.
He hasn't yet explained the case—he isn't talking much.
Some of us thought
That like as not
The mule had learned a trick or two Philetus hadn't got.

Reason For Laughter.

When the young mistress of the house entered the kitchen she carried herself with great dignity. She had come to call the cook to account.

"Mary," she said, "I must insist that you keep better hours and that you have less company in the kitchen at night. Last night I was kept awake because of the uproarious laughter of one of your women friends."

"Yis, mum, I know," Mary replied cheerfully, "but she couldn't help it. I was telling her how you tried to make cake yesterday morning."—Birmingham (England) Post.

An Impressionist.

His Friend—But what does it mean? The Artist—Ah, that's just it! Don't mean nawthin! I'm a impressionist!—New York American.

A Thing to Avoid.

"Ha, that's a clever story," laughed Dawson. "Here comes Borem; tell it to him."

"No," said Mawson, "it would be suggestive to him."

"Nonsense! Nobody could possibly consider that story suggestive."

"He could. He'd consider it suggestive of some old chestnut which he'd insist upon telling."—Catholic Standard and Times.

On Display.

Husband—Why in the world do you keep your new fur boa hanging out on the line?

Mrs. Fluffy—Because I nearly roast with it on this kind of weather and it's the only way I can let people know that I've got it.—Detroit Free Press.

Reward of Genius.

Meeks—There goes a successful inventor.

Weeks—So? What did he invent?

Meeks—He invented a new excuse to give his wife for remaining out till after midnight, and, strange to say, it worked.—Chicago News.

As to Love.

Aunt Jane—But do you really believe young Mr. Amour loves you as much as he says he does?

Eunice—Of course not, Aunt Jane. A lover who can't exaggerate his affection is just no lover at all.—Boston Transcript.

His Invention.

Mrs. McFlub—Your husband seems to be quite versatile. Has he ever invented anything?

Mrs. Sleeth—Oh, yes; one of the finest lines of midnight excuses you ever listened to.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

His Technical Defense.

"What reason does he give for not paying his wife alimony?"

"He says that marriage is a lottery, and hence alimony is a gambling debt."—Collier's Weekly.

Running No Risks.

"Have you any teeth, grandpa?"

"No, my boy."

"Then you can hold these nuts for me."—Columbia Jester.

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

At this hour, 9:45 a. m., Jan. 31th, the sad news comes to us as we pick up our pencil to jot down the happenings of our town and vicinity, that our good kind friend the aged and much loved wife of Rev. Wm. E. George, has been called to her reward, leaving a devoted husband and four children surviving her, viz. Theopholis, of Barton; Hon. A. Fredirck, of near Swanton, who is the efficient and trusted Rural Route Inspector for the Postoffice Department; Mrs. John L. Fitzwater, of near Beckman, Garrett county, and Alexander C. of this place. Funeral arrangement have not been made, but her remains will be intered in the Deer Park cemetery, on Thursday, February 2, if her son, A. F. George, who is in Ohio, gets here in time. A more extended account of this sad bereavment by way of tribute to this good woman will appear later.

The severe storm of the past week has so completely blocked the roads that our coal teamsters can only get to the Tower mines for coal. We are glad that our citizens are patronizing this mine, as Mr. Tower has guaranteed his coal to be as good as the Sharpless or George Creek coal and should be patronize for his enterprise in helping develop the resources of our own community.

Pauline, the much loved child of Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Jones, still lingers, hovering between life and death, but the attending physicians have hopes of her recovery, with proper care, all of which she will get by two of the most devoted and loving parents that any child can have in this world. Mr. and Mrs. Jones have been commented upon for years for their devotion to all their bright and intelligent children.

Rev. Percy W. Metheny is conducting his series of meetings in the M. E. church and they are well attended by all our people regardless of the severe storms of winter, but as yet no seeming impression made as to a future life, but to our young brother, we will say, don't be discouraged, for earnest appeals to the Godless will bring the desire of your heart for like bread cast upon the waters, it will return after many days.

Rev. E. Manges, of the Lutheran church, attended the services in the Methodist church on Sabbath night last, and cancelled his own appointment out of respect to this demonination, who so kindly gave way to him two weeks ago. This is the kind of a spirit that should exist among all denominations. Let fraternity be the watch word among true christians and the walls of sectarianism will be broken down.

Our good friends, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. W. Hennen, of this place, talk of leaving the first of April, much to the regret of their many friends, who have in the past two years learned to love every member of this noble and cultured family. Mr. Hennen owns a fine home in Keyser, and as he can't get a good tenant or disposed of his property and having the advantage of better schools at Keyser, and all of their relations living there, being among the best and most prominent of that progressive town, we can't blame him when we consider the Hon. Frank Reynolds, Doctor Thomas West, Mr. Obed Babb, his brothers-in-law, and his aged mother, who makes her home among her children of that place, principally at the beautiful home of Dr. West.

Mr. John L. Fitzwater, of North Glade, near Beckman, just came up to his father-in-law's, owing to the death of Mrs. George. His wife was with her mother during all her sickness and is one of the most devoted and loving daughter, that an aged mother could have.

Mrs. P. M. Stemple, of Morgantown, W. Va., accompanied by her daughter, Miss Minnie, assistant teacher in the Oakland school, arrived in this place yesterday and are visiting their many relatives. We wish them a pleasant sojourn among the scenes of other days when they called Deer Park their home, and where they can look out and see the snow capped great Backbone Mountains, and all nature wrapped in its fleecy blanket of snow, so different from their adopted home on the Monongahela waters in the "West Virginia Hills."

Mr. Charles Laughlin, wife and child, arrived in our town on Monday's east bound train and report says owing to his health he will occupy his mother's home on Church street, known as "Mountain Home," one of the popular summer homes of Deer Park. Mr. Laughlin's health has been on the decline for some years owing to his close attention as operator on one of the Pennsylvania roads. He was born and raised in this place and has many relatives in Garrett county. He is the only surviving son of the late Rev. John S. Laughlin, who died in 1887.

Mr. Wm. L. Shaffer, Mr. L. T. Friend and a number of citizens of No. 10 District are in Oakland today attending the meeting of the County Commissioners and having tax assessments readjusted.

Mr. W. B. Miller expects to return to Baltimore as soon as weather conditions will permit resumption of work in the burned district of the great fire of one year ago. Mr. Miller is one of Deer Park's best workman and one that has the confidence and respect of all who have the pleasure of his acquaintance.

Mr. E. G. Miller, father of the above, who has been quite unwell for the past two or three weeks, we are glad to note is much better, but very weak and can't be out of his home during this inclement weather, much to his anoyance owing to his industrial habits.

We are glad to learn that the Lutheran denomination has secured the option on the Corrigan lot, one of the best locations in your town, and one the county should have had for a new court house, but they have as usual procrastinated, and our taxpayers will have to climb the hill as they have done since 1877, and will have to do so until the old brick walls give way or until progressive men are put in office that will live for the future and not keep in the same old ruts of the past. If the shoe pinches let it pinch, and let the officials wear it gracefully. So, Mr. Editor, pardon the closing sarcasm, and remember it is not said for disrespect or in fun.

If they want to know, just say

MORE ANON.

BITTINGER.

At conclusion of the protracted services held in the Lutheran church at this place by Rev. J. B. Shoup, during the week ending Jan. 21st, thirteen new members were added to the congregation. Communion services were held on the following Sabbath morning, which was attended by the largest number of persons attending a like service here for years past.

A government official visited this section recently in the interest of the Postoffice Department, and as a result It is probable that a material change will be made in the route between this point and Grantsville, which change, if made will be very acceptable to the citizens of this section.

Messrs. Manassa and Lloyd Brenneman have moved their saw mill to the Thomas Station farm where they will saw a quantity of lumber for Mr. Stanton.

Miss Amanda Ellithorpe is spending a few days with friends and relatives in and near the New Germany settlement.

Mr. William Meyers, of near Meyersdale, who has been in this section for some weeks, returned to his home last Sunday.

Mr. William Smith, an employee of the Jennings R. R., had his shoulder and arm badly crushed last Saturday morning, while coupling cars. Medical attendance was secured promptly and no fatal result is anticipated.

Master Irvin Bittinger, youngest son of Mrs. K. A. Bittinger, was badly scalded about the arm one day last week, while at play.

This is Groundhog Day.

Today is Groundhog Day. It isn't a national holiday, but a good many people will observe the signs on this day and give them more attention than they do on other days of more National importance. If the sun shines, (and it has just broken through the clouds as this is being written), it means that Mr. Hog will see his shadow and go back to his burrow for the six more long winter weeks to follow. The theory is that if the sun don't shine and the pig has no opportunity of seeing his reflection he may conclude to remain in the open for good, which means that winter is practically over.

Complimentary Words Highly Appreciated.

The editor of this paper is in receipt of a letter from Mr. Robert D. Clark, manager of the Printing branch of the American Type Founders Company, manufacturers of everything entering into the make-up of a printing office, in which that gentleman compliments us upon the appearance of The Republican since the installation of a new dress of advertising type and also some samples of job printing executed at this office.

Mr. Clark's letter, in part, follows

Mr. Benj. H. Sincell,
Oakland, Md.,

DEAR SIR—We are in receipt of a copy of THE REPUBLICAN on January 19th, sent us by our Mr. Steltz, and we cannot help but notice the great difference of the appearance of the advertising columns in the use of Century Expanded.

Not wishing to give any offence, we believe that if you would complete the dress of the paper and set entirely with Century Expanded all your subscribers, advertisers and competitors as well would take their hats off to THE REPUBLICAN. You have started a good thing—keep it up. We also note job work set in "Bookman." Think the man who has charge of that department is well on to his job, using a slang phrase."

In order that our readers may understand the above we wish to explain that "Century Expanded" is the type in which advertisements are set and that "Bookman" is a job letter face. Mr. Leonard Lochner is the artist who executed the work referred to.

Order of Publication.

Amelia E. Poling v. Isaac James Poling.
No. 1319 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett county, Maryland.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree, divorcing the plaintiff, a vinculo matrimonii, from the defendant.

The bill states that the plaintiff and defendant were married in the year 1873 and that about ten years ago the defendant abandoned and deserted the plaintiff; that the conduct of the plaintiff towards her husband has always been kind and above reproach and that the defendant abandoned the plaintiff without just cause or reason and that such abandonment has continued uninterrupted for more than ten years and is deliberate and final and the separation of the parties beyond any reasonable expectation of reconciliation; that seven children have been born to said parties as a result of said marriage, the oldest of whom is thirty-one years of age and the youngest sixteen years of age; that the plaintiff desires to resume her maiden name, Amelia Elizabeth Shirley, and that the defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a decree divorcing the plaintiff and defendant a vinculo matrimonii; that the plaintiff be permitted to resume her maiden name and for general relief and an order of publication against the absent defendant.

It is thereupon, the 21st day of January, 1905, by the Circuit Court for Garret county, in Equity, ordered, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper, published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 4th day of March, 1905, give notice to the said absent defendant of the object and substance of this bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor on or before the 20th day of March next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 28. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1905. NUMBER 50

THE OFFICIAL COUNT WILL BE FINAL

No Going Behind The Returns In Amendment Election.

CARE IN SELECTING JUDGES.

Exceptional Vigilance Will Be Exercised By Both Sides—Hot Fight Prepared For—Decision of Court Not Yet Made.

In the struggle next fall over a negro disfranchising amendment to the Constitution, which is generally believed by both Republicans and Democrats to be inevitable, notwithstanding the fact that the Court of Appeals has not rendered its decision in the case now pending, there is one point which up to the present time has escaped public attention, and that is that the result will be decided by the count of the judges of election, and there will be no way in which to go back of these returns, which will be absolutely final.

Former State Senator Lewis Putzel, who is a member of the Republican legal advisory committee appointed last fall by State Chairman John B. Hanna, called attention to this fact yesterday, and pointed out that there is in the law no provision by which there can be obtained in any way a recount of the ballots cast for and against the amendment, and that no court in the State will be entitled to pass judgment upon any contest in which the amendment figures.

While provision is made in the law for the recounting of the ballots in contests against candidates elected on the ticket, this provision does not include the amendment, and the returns of the election judges must be considered as final. Being fore-warned of this condition of affairs, it is believed that exceptional plans will be [illegible]en by both the Democratic and [illegible]ublican organizations to put in as [illegible]ection officials for next fall only [illegible]nen upon whom they can implicitly [illegible]ely, and upon whom they can trust to protect the interests of their party.

After the election, should the amendment be adopted or rejected, it will not, it is declared avail in the least the losing side to raise the cry of "fraud," or "bribery" or "corruption," as the returns made up the judges and passed upon by the canvassing boards must stand.

As each party will have two judges of election and one clerk, in addition to a watcher, the claim is made that if the proper men are selected for these positions there should not be the slightest difficulty in securing an absolutely fair and impartial count of the ballots, and the fact that it will be possible to go behind the returns will by no means mean that these returns will not be perfectly fair and trustworthy.

In advance of the decision of the Court of Appeals there appears to be considerable confidence, not only among the counsel for Mr. Vandiver and the Democratic managers, but among Republican and Democratic lawyers generally, that the mandamus preceedings instituted by Mr. Vandiver will be decided in his favor and that the amendment will go upon the ballot. Many of the Republicans say that, as a mere matter of law, they believe the court will undoubtedly sustain the petition of the plaintiff, and having been advised to this effect, the Republican State leaders are going steadily ahead with their preliminary preparations for the fall battle

That it will be a fight to a finish is conceded by both sides, and it already overshadows in interest the Councilmanic election of the coming spring. Senator Gorman, it is declared by his close friends and supporters among the State leaders, will actively direct the Democratic campaign, and is as vitally interested in the success of the amendment as it is possible for him to be in anything.

One reason for this is said to be the effect its fate will have upon the election of the Legislature in the fall of [illegible], which Legislature is to choose Mr. Gorman's successor in the United States Senate. That Mr. Gorman is now, and will be then, a candidate for re-election is not doubted by any of his friends, and this, it is declared, is the main cause why he proposes to make the fight for the amendment a winning one if it is possible to do so.

It is asserted by some observers of political happenings that it is Mr. Gorman's rule not to interfere nor actively participate in political fights in which he has not a personal stake, and that this fact is proved by his past record. His intense interest in the success of the Constitutional amendment is explained by these observers as due largely to the personal interest he feels, and the fact that it will undoubtedly have an effect upon his re-election to the Senate.

Many of the Democratic leaders in both city and State profess to believe that there has recently been a considerable change of sentiment in favor of the disfranchising amendment, and they contend that the moral effect of the decision of the Court of Appeals sustaining the Vandiver mandamus will still further change this sentiment. The decision is expected almost any day.

ITALIAN'S FEET FROZEN.

Found at the Nethkin Mine Saturday Morning in Bad Shape.

John Kazuke, an Italian employed as a trackman on the Swallow Falls extension of the Kendall railroad, was found in the miners' shanty at the Nethken mine, a few miles north of Oakland last Saturday morning with his feet very badly frozen.

The man with another of his countrymen and two Americans, all of whom are employes of the Kendall company, had been to Oakland on Friday where the Italians had imbibed of the cup that cheers, starting home about eight o'clock on foot. At the Nethken mine Kazuke went into the shanty and laid down, going to sleep and while sleeping the frost king nipped him. He is now at the home of Joseph Friend, near Sang Run, where he is being treated by Dr. Newman, who states that he will recover without any serious consequences.

Tribute to Mrs. Wm. E. George.

Died, at her home in Deer Park, on January 31st, at 9.45 oclock a. m. after suffering of many weeks, Mrs. Jane George, wife of Rev. Wm. E. George. Mrs. George was born in England, in 1824, being in her 82nd year at the time of her death. She leaves a devoted and aged husband and four loving children to mourn the loss of one of the most precious and kind mother's that any children could be blessed with in this life, and has left a void, an aching void, that will never be filled this side of the tomb.

Funeral services were held in the M. E. church Feb. 3rd at 2 p. m. conducted by Rev. J. C. Price, of Swanton, assisted by Rev. Percy M. Metheny, Rev. W. H. Clary, of Deer Park, and Rev. Mr. Weigel of Cranesville, W. Va. Rev. Price took for his text part of the 23rd chapter of Genesis; the burial place of Sarah; and his discourse was so appropriate, in the burial of this aged mother in Israel, far away from the scenes of her youth, but no "stranger and sojourn," with us in the home of her adoption for the past fifty-odd years. More than thirty she has spent in this county, and twenty in this place, where all who came to know was to love and admire, for the gentle and christian character and her unselfish devotion to her four loving children, who loved her living and will mourn her dead.

The following gentleman. All warm friends of the deceased, and family, acted as pall bearers. Active, George L. Lininger, Wm. B. Miller, S. P. Specht, W. C. Jones, L. D. Thrasher and George J. Walter; honorary, J. W. Laughlin, M. D., Abraham Freeland, Walter Engle, E. F. Droege, George Marley and Wm. D. Hove.

The following appropriate hymns were sung at the funeral: "Asleep in Jesus," "Nearer my God to Thee," "Jesus Lover of my Soul," We'll Never Say Goodbye in Heaven."

All that was mortal of this sainted wife, mother and friend was laid to rest in the Deer Park cemetary at 3.30 o'clock February 3rd, 1905.

Many and beautiful floral offerings crowned the casket donated by her devoted children and grand-children.

With all the sympathy of heart going out to the aged and feeble husband, left so lonely, O, so lonely, in his old age after a wedded life of over sixty two years, with not a jar to molest the bliss of this happy union, but to this minister of the Gospel for over sixty years, we know with an acquaintance of twenty two years, that you will soon meet the loved one gone before; and will embrace the one most dear in a fairer clime than this.

With tears we close this humble tribute and ask heaven's richest blessing on all her children left behind, who will miss a mother's love in this life.

CITY FATHERS IN MONTHLY SESSION.

Routine Business Transacted at Monday Evening's Session.

LOT BOUGHT FOR NEW BUILDING

For Municipal Purpose Which Will Contain Lock-up, Justice's Court, Fire Department and Council Chamber—New Fire Apparatus.

The City Council met in regular session at the council chamber Monday evening with all members of that body, Mayor McComas and Clerk John C. Dunham present.

The minutes of the January meeting were read and approved.

Mr. C. E. Offutt appeared and asked a reduction in the schedule of charges for weighing coal on the town scales, said reduction to apply only on coal used at the electric plant which is dug at the mine owned by Mr. D. E. Offutt. The phraseology of the ordinance being such no reduction could be allowed and the matter was referred to the weighmaster who was instucted to make satisfactory arrangements with Mr. Offutt for the service.

A permit was granted William J. Nair for the erection of a six-room frame dwelling house at the corner of Centre and Gilmor streets.

Permission was also granted Mr. Benj. H. Sincell to erect and maintain a steel tower 75 feet high and tank of 20,000 gallons capacity on the lot in the rear of THE REPUBLICAN building, the water from said tank to be used in case of fire and for ordinary office and store purposes.

Mayor McComas, who was appointed at the January meeting to confer with Mr. George W. Legge relative to the purchase of the triangular lot of ground at the corner of Liberty and First streets, as a site for the proposed new municipal building, reported that the lot could be purchased for $1000. The Mayor recommended that the land be bought and that a building commeasurate with the growing needs of the town be erected thereon. Mayor McComas also recommended that a double cylinder chemical engine and new material to fully equip the present fire apparatus be purchased at once.

Another recommendation upon which the council took favorable action made by the Mayor, was that the street commissioner be instructed to clear the sidewalks of snow with the snow shovel recently constructed the work to be done on the morning following the fall of snow and before the activebusiness of the day begins.

Bills were passed as follows:

E. Z. Tower, for recording, etc., $13.15; Oakland Electric Co., January light, $65.95; A. C. Wotring, work on streets, $10.50; Dixon & Kelso, nails, lumber, etc., $15.29; A. G. Sturgiss, car fare for paupers, $2.32; Oakland Pharmacy, soda and acid for chemical engine, $18.51; J. J. Sweeney, cleaning uniform, $3; A. C. Wotring for cleaning snow from pavements, $3.

The bill of D. E. Offutt & Sons, for cement, soda and buckets used at the recent fire, was referred to the finance committee for auditing, as was also the bill of C. B. Cropp & Co., for soda.

The report of the weigh master showing collections of $31 at the town scales was filed; collections for platforms of $55.51 and from the tax collector on taxes of 1904, amounting to $83.87 were also made.

Agreeable to the recommendation of Mayor McComas an order was passed authorizing the purchase of the Legge lot for $1000, the payments to extend over a period of four years with interest on the deferred amounts.

A committee consisting of the Mayor and Councilmen Bolden and Lawton was appointed to draft plans and submit the same at the meeting of Council to be held on the night of the 20th inst. for the proposed new municipal building, the same to contain quarters for the fire department, police justice's office, lock-up and council chamber and to be constructed of material other than wood.

An order was passed instructing the Mayor to dispose of the present municipal building and lot for the sum of $800.

The question of a more efficient fire department was then taken up and discussed at length, terminating in the appointment of a committee consisting of Councilmen Lawton and Harned to secure prices for an additional chemical engine, ladders, and other paraphernalia necessary. This committee was also instructed to purchase at once the necessary supplies to make the equipment more effective, and to make its report at the special meeting to be held on the evening of the 20th inst.

Mrs. Ella E. Ison.

Mrs. Ella E. Ison was the daughter of the later Joshua O. Robinson, and was born near Wilson's, Allegany county, now Garrett county, Md.

In 1840 she was married to the late Rev. Benj. Ison. Their first charge was Grantsville circuit. They moved to Oakland in 1877, where they resided with but slight intermission until her death. Her daughter Ella died Dec. 24th, 1900, and her husband May 12th, 1901.

Sister Ison passed away suddenly and peacefully Jan. 25th at Washington D. C., where she was spending the winter with her two sons, Willey O. and H. Allen Ison.

The deceased was never in robust health, but when she left her home in Oakland last fall appeared cheerful and in better health than usual. Her sudden demise was a great shock to her many warm friends, not only in Oakland but wherever she was known. Although in her seventy-seventh year she was unusually active for one of her age. She was a devout Christian, a good neighbor, an affectionate wife and a devoted mother. She was loyal to the church and as a co-worker with her husband she assisted in a great measure in advancing and pushing forward the interests of the same. She, with her late husband, always successful in building up and strengthening the church wherever assigned. But few men were more faithful and successful in ministerial work then Brother Ison. He was within the bounds of the West Virginia Conference when it was separated from the Pittsburg Conference and remained in the new Conference from choice and spent the remainder of his long life in helping to strengthen and build up Methodism in the Conference thus formed by the division.

He with his good wife filled many important places traveling circuits, filling stations and more than once was presiding elder. As a preacher Dr. Ison was logical, scriptural and instructive. He was a bible student, fond of poetry and frequently quoted selections from choice poems. As pastor he was faithful; not only a welcome visitor among the families of those holding to the Methodist faith but to members of other denominations as well. He was a real benediction to the community where he happened to be located.

Sister Ison was always ready to do her part in assisting her husband in church work; was active in the prayer meeting and altar services. Finally the Master said "It is enough," and Sister Ison passed from the scenes and cares of earth to join her husband and daughter where neither shadow or night is ever known.

The life work of these faithful servants is done and well done. Although passed from earth it may be truly said they "rest from their labors and their works do follow them." Through their labors and influence hundreds have been born into the Kingdom. Surely there will be stars in their crowns.

The funeral services in Washington were conducted by Rev. R. M. Moore, pastor of Foundry M. E. church, which she attended, assisted by Rev. G. C. Bacon, D. D., of Douglas M. E. church, and Rev. Dr. Dawson, pastor of Mt. Pleasant M. E. church.

The funeral services at Oakland were in charge of Rev. J. B. Workman. Appropriate music was rendered, and addresses made by Revs. R. B. Ward and J. M. Davis.

The funeral was attended by her two sons W. O. and H. A. Ison, and Mrs. H. A. Ison, and Sue Berry, her niece from Washington, her brother Capt. W. J. Robinson of Parkersburg, and Claude E. Robinson her nephew, of Cumberland, and his wife Mrs. C. E. Robinson.

The pall bearers were C. S. Davis, Geo. M. Mason, A. D. Naylor, C. H. Loar, John Casteel and Arthur Townshend.

Bought Timber Tract.

The Kendall & Deeter Lumber Co., have purchased a half interest in the Johnson tract of timber, midway between Salisbury and Frostburg, the deal having been closed on Monday. This is the last tract of hemlock that is left in this immediate vicinity, and it will be sawed and placed on the market at once. The Newman Bros., of Salisbury, own the other half, and a mill is already in operation on the property.—Cumberland News.

KILLED AT BLOOMINGTON

Lafayette McRobie, a Former Resident of Oakland, Crushed to Death.

Lafayette McRobie, for a number of years employed at Bloomington, this county, in the mines about that place, met with a sudden death last Friday afternoon when a rock weighing two tons or more fell from the roof of the Marsteller mine, where he was working, and crushed him to death.

As soon as the accident became known to his fellow workers in the mine a number of them went to his assistance but death had occurred before they could remove the immense rock.

The deceased was a son of the late William McRobie, of Oakland, having been born and reared in Oakland, where his mother and a number of brothers and two sisters still reside.

His remains were brought here on the morning accommodation Monday and taken to the home of Henry Selders, his brother-in-law, from whence after services conducted by Rev. John M. Davis, they were conveyed to the cemetery and interred.

The deceased leaves a widow and four children, two of whom are married.

The body was accompanied to Oakland by the following from Bloomington: County Commissioner Jacob Stump, Robert Morehead, Silas Cramer, Jas. Nennell, Frank Leonard, William Morehead, William Ward, James Sullivan and Conrad Miller.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Rev. Geo. W. Leatherman, Pres't of the Forest Spring Improvement Co., Forest Springs, W. Va., was a business caller at this place last Thursday.

Rev. Joseph Lee, of Wheeling, W. Va., was in the Park last week looking at houses. He wants to bring his family to the Park next month.

Mrs. S. E. Flowers, of Bond, Md., was a visitor at the Park last Friday. On Saturday she and her son Harry went to Willsonburg, W. Va., where Mrs. F. expects to reside.

Mr. C. F. Dawson went to Rowlesburg, W. Va., last Monday to do some papering.

Miss Gertie Campbell went to Washington, D. C., Tuesday last, to visit friends.

The Misses. Weber, Miss Sadie Laughlin, Mrs. Lou Waters, and Messrs. Frank and George Weber spent Friday evening at Dr. Campbell's—a birthday call on Miss Gertie.

Mr. M. L. Selby came up from Grafton Saturday and spent Sunday with his family.

Dr. and Mrs. McLain, and Misses Kate and Margaret of Wheeling, leave New York today for a tour of the West Indies.

The Methodist church suffers a great loss in the burning of the main building of the West Va. University at Buckhannon.

INSTRUCTIONS WILL BE GIVEN FOR JAIL PLANS

At Meeting of the Board of County Commissioners Tuesday.

ARCHITECTS EMPLOYED FOR WORK

Who Will Meet Commissioners Here—Clarksburg Firm Has Contract—Commissioners Were at That Town Last Friday.

Two members of the Board of County Commissioners, Messrs. Stephens and Stump, accompanied by Clerk Ross, who visited New York City last week to inspect the jails of that city in order to acquaint themselves with the construction of the modern places of detention, arrived here early last week, Mr. Stump and Mr. Ross on Sunday night and Mr. Stephens Monday night, the latter remaining in the vicinity of the Metropolis a day longer in order to make a visit to his sister, who lives at Tompkinsville, Staten Island.

The visit of the officials was made very pleasant, the city authorities showing them every courtesy and the information gained will be of especial benefit in the planning and construction of Garrett county's proposed new jail.

After the adjournment of the Commissioners on last Friday morning they went to Clarksburg, West Va., where a new building has recently been completed and while there contracted with the firm of Holmboe & Rafferty, architects, to meet with the Commissioners here on Tuesday of next week to confer respecting the plans for the new building in Oakland. This firm made the plans for the Clarksburg jail, the building being a model one in every detail.

Several weeks will elapse after the plans have been settled upon before the invitation is made to contractors for the submission of bids for the erection of the structure.

The Humming of Wires.

Herr Bock, of Babenhausen, Germany, has been carrying on observations of the humming, both of telegraph and telephone wires. The humming of wires running east and west is said to presage a fall of temperature, often 10 or more hours in advance of the thermometer; the humming of wires north and south advises a rise in temperature, almost always several hours in advance of the thermometer.

S. L. Townshend & Son.

Mr. Arthur Townshend, who has been associated with S. L. Townshend & Son for the past 20 years, has retired from the firm.

We invite you to call and would be pleased to have your orders.

Yours truly,

MRS. S. L. TOWNSHEND.

The Second Miracle in Cana.

Galiee was a populous, commercial, and comparatively unconventional district. It was more in touch with the great world of art and traffic. In infusion of foreign elements in its distance from the seat of national ecclesiasticism had a liberalizing influence. All tended to make it a favorable field for Jesus' ministry. Here He spent most of His time, worked most of His miracles, preached most of His sermons.

One obstacle stood in His way. He was Himself a Galilean. He diagnosed the case when He said a prophet is not honored in his own country. Familiarity with him breeds contempt of him. But Jesus had forestalled this by His brief career at Jerusalem. His honor was an exotic transplanted from Judea to Galilee. The Galilean pilgrims brought His fame back with them. So He was "received."

At the very scene of His first miracle came an importunate appeal for the working of another. A father's heart wrung by anguish, forgetful of rank and station, makes its pitiful appeal. What recks it if he is a king's officer? Shall he stand upon any ceremony while his son lies at the point of death?

Thus early in His career Jesus announces a fundamental principle which shall guide Him in the use of miraculous power. His signs and wonders are not wrought to extort faith from others. On the contrary, it shall be faith that extorts them from Him. This faith the nobleman shows in his journey of twenty miles, and in the language of his appeal. The strength of his faith is further manifested in the way it endures an unexpected and severe test. Healing in absentia was not so much as dreamed of. Yet, when Jesus spoke the word the man "believed," and "went." There was no dubious hesitation or further appeal for Jesus' own presence.

But on the morrow the nobleman's faith was destined to sweep out in a wider circle to embrace the Miracle-worker in a new and diviner office. When, by comparison of hours, it was discovered that the moment of the child's recovery was identical with that in which Jesus uttered the word of power, "Thy son liveth," then the nobleman believed His Divine nature and Messiahship. In this faith his whole house shared. So we have the lovely spectacle of the first converted family.

It has been affirmed by several authorities that St. John had a philosophy of his own in harmony with which he wrote his Gospel. He certainly had a method in the selection of incidents, miracles, and discourses which he recorded. In this instance of the nobleman, a story which bears the stamp of evident truth, the evangelist gives in epitome the history of the generation, growth, and fruitage of faith. There is the sense of imperative need, the patent insufficiency of the human resourses, the quest of power, the cry of the soul uttered in action, "O, that I might find Him of whom Moses and the prophets have spoken." The miracle is a notable instance of not quenching the smoking flax. It has been said that Jesus lit up the little spark of faith in the breast of the nobleman into a clear and enduring flame for the light and comfort of himself and his house.

Jesus had just been ignominiously thrust out of Nazareth, His own city. It must have been humanly speaking, gratifying under the circumstances to have this recognition of His power on the part of the nobleman of Capernaum. In a time of unfaith here was one who showed faith in Him. It is true it was not as high a type of faith as that shown by the Samaritans. It required a sign for its confirmation. The nobleness of the Samaritan faith was that it required no other sign but Jesus' self. However, it was possible for the Galilean faith to evolve into a type similar to the Samaritan. And it did.

The sweet humanness of this narrative captures the heart. It is a voice of nature. One can not but exclaim, "It must be true!" The nobleness of the nobleman is his affection for his son. His trouble gave him feet. He could not be rebuffed.

"The Galilean Spring" is the apt designation of this opening of Jesus' ministry in the north country. He sought and saw His opportunity. He sowed His seed with tireless and tragic diligence. The harvests of that sowing are still being reaped.

The Teacher's Lantern.

A Scotchman and his wife were at prayer for a sick child. Even in his extremity habit asserted itself. He was using one of his phrases, "Lord, remember Thine ancient people, and turn again the captivity of Zion!" When the woman pulled his coat and exclaimed, "Eh, mon! Ye are aye drawn out for the Jews, but it's our bairn that's a-deein," and then she cried, "O, help us, Lord, and give us our darling back if it is Thy holy will, but if he is to be taken, make us know Thou wilt have him with Thyself!"

Childhood stands conspicuously in the Bible. More miracles are worked upon children than upon any other one class. Directions are given concerning them. Promises are made to them. Those who cause them to offend are threatened. Jesus set a child in the midst of His disciples to teach them humility. He made the child-nature the requisite of entrance to His kingdom. The most radient picture of the New Testament is that of Jesus with a child in his arms.

Every generation seeks after a sign—some marvel with an unseen cause. Human nature craves the sensation of surprise. It is a species of intoxication. Jesus called a halt to this. He guarded Himself against the imputation of being a mere vender of cures.

There is a faith of a low type. It is selfish. It is of the fire-escape order. The highest type of faith does not need to be shored up by miracles. It responds to Jesus' ideal of life—to Jesus' self. It rests in Him as the highest type of human character and at the same time the source of Divine power to aid in the evolution of personal character after the heavenly pattern.

Jesus apparently began a discourse upon the evil of seeking religious sensations, as such, and to define the use and purpose of His miracles. But when He saw the state of the man's mind, He desisted. The average Church worker may find a caution here. There are conjunctions of circumstances which make "teaching" inopportune and impossible. It has been said circumstances are better educators than verbal teaching.

Letter to P. Rodeheaver.
Oakland.

Dear Sir: Mr. N. Avery, Delhi, N Y. had two houses exactly alike, and painted them: one Devoe lead-and-zinc; the other barytes-and-zinc. He paid same price for both paints.

He used six gallons of lead-and-zinc, 12 gallons barytes-and-zinc.

He paid $18 for painting lead-and-zic, $36 for painting barytes-and-zinc.

The total cost of the lead-and-zinc job was $ 27; the total cost of the barytes-and zinc job was $54.

He didn't known he was buying barytes; the dealer told him that paint was good as Devoe.

A fair example of how it generally comes-out, when you buy "something just as good." Better go by the name: the name; and the same is Devoe.

Yours truly

DEATH OF MR. NORMAN JACOBS.

Old Resident Of Garrett County Passes Away At The Age Of 82 Years.

Mr. Norman Jacobs, one of the oldest, most favorably known and highly esteemed residents of Garrett county, died at "the old home place," Oak Springs, near Lonaconing, Friday evening last, at the advanced age of 82 years, 4 months, and 28 days. Mr. Jacobs had been in feeble health for six months or more, and had been confined to his bed the past six or seven weeks. Death was due to general debility superinduced by old age. During his declining years Mr. Jacobs was the object of the tender care of Hon. and Mrs. William H. Jacobs with whom he made his home and the twilight of his life was radiant with the sunset of a noble and honorable career. Loving hands provided him with every comfort and he entered the valley with a smile reflecting the faith of a true man and Christian, who, having finished his course goes to his merited reward. He had prepared for the end long years ago, and his closing days were marked by his reliance upon the gospel. He was fully conscious to the last and recognized those about him, and even after his tongue refused to perform its functions he indicated to them his entire peace with God and all the world. Death came at 8:10 p. m. Friday and he fell asleep to awaken in eternity.

Mr. Norman Jacobs was born at the place where he died, now Oak Springs, August 30, 1822. He was married on May 16, 1844, to Miss Charlotte Shaw, who preceded him across the river on Oct. 9, 1869 There was but one child, Hon. William H. Jacobs, a member of the House of Delegates in 1898, who survives with his family. He lived at Firm Rock for ten years, returning to Oak Springs upon the marriage of his son to Miss Ida Meyers, with whom he has resided ever since. He made extended visits to the west some years ago and spent some time in Florida, but has always made his home at Oak Springs. He is also survived by one sister, Mrs. Martha Calhoun, of Marshalltown, Iowa. Of a family of ten orginally, Mrs. Calhoun is now the only survivor. There are four grandchildren, Messrs. Stanley, Frank and Alvey, and Miss Flossie Jacobs, sons and daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. H. Jacobs. There are three great-grandchildren, Masters Irl, Glenn and John Jacobs, sons of Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Jacobs, who resides near by. For three years there resided in the same house four generation of the Jacobs family. Miss Lida Koontz, of Fairmont, W. Va., a cousin, was present at the funeral.

The funeral took place Sunday afternoon. Before the hour for the services to begin large numbers of neighbors and friends viewed the remains. The deceased lay in a handsome oak couch casket, and seemed to be asleep, so natural and peaceful were the features. The casket rested under a white lace canopy, and the room was a bower of evergreen. Beautiful flowers adorned the casket. Services were conducted by Rev. J. L. Winger, of the Barton M. E. Church at 2 o'clock, after which the funeral proceeded to the Hansell burying ground, where the remains were interred. The grave was lined with lace-trimmed linen. Prior to the death the deceased had given explicit instructions to his son concerning the details of his funeral. He requested that he be buried beside his father and mother, and that the grave be six feet deep above the box. He also selected hymns to be sung and particular passages of scripture to be read. All his requests were carried out to the minutest detail by his son, who saw to it that his every wish was gratified after death as it had been in life.

The pallbearers were nephews of the deceased, as follows: Messrs. Nathan P. F. and F. C. Michael, of Firm Rock; George H. Shaw of Lord; J. P. Shaw, of Barton; Zedok, Allen and Joseph L. Shaw, of Moscow.

The funeral was an unusually large one, notwithstanding the severe cold and deep snow.

Mr. Wm. H. Jacobs and family desire us to extend their thanks to the public for their kindness and sympathy, and to Mr. Gustave and Miss Minnie Echhorn for the very efficient manner in which all the details of the undertaking and funeral were carried out.—Lonaconing Star.

BLOOMINGTON.

Piedmont Independent.

Mrs. Ollie Rayley is in Cumberland visiting Miss Emma Ridgelev.

About twelve miners were furloughed at the Buxton mine on last Tuesday morning for loading dirty coal. The furlough extended from Tuesday until the following Monday.

Mrs. Howard Carroll, of Piedmont, was a guest of her sister, Mrs. G. C. Pattison on last Wednesday.

Mr. "Burke" Reynolds, a popular young gentlemen from Cross, was a business and social visitor on Friday last.

Mr. Emory Fazenbaker, from Savage, was in town on Monday.

Rev. Howard is steadily gaining strength and expects to be out on the street in a few days.

A broken wheel under the smoker of the fast No. 12 on last Saturday night, gave the passenger a great shaking up. The accident was noticed at the Junction shortly after it occurred and the train stopped before the car was derailed. No. 12 was delaved about three hours and when the train arrived in Cumberland the entire front of the engine was bespattered with blood and flesh, supposed to be human. The engineer and fireman could not account for it although they had noticed the smell of cooked meat some time before they got to Cumberland. Telegrams were sent out and inquiry made and next day a track walker found four horse shoes at 21st bridge and some horse hair on a telegraph pole near by. An old horse was missing from the community and this explained the gruesome appearance of the engine that frightened the citizens at South Cumberland.

Misses Jennie, Ida and Ada Knight, Lula Johnson, of Piedmont and Nannie Kight, of Keyser, a bunch of bright and interesting young ladies were in town Sunday.

Mr. "Gus" Rowe, of Savage, reported the thermometer 3 degrees below zero at his home on last Thursday morning.

The breaking of the "bull" wheel in connection with the rope haulage at the Buxton mine, on last Saturday morning, necessiated a suspension of work until Wednesday morning.

Mr. Nicholas Paugh, of near Frankville, a connecting link between the past and present generations in his vicinity, was in town this week visiting the family of his daughter, Mrs. Adam Elliott. "Nick" as he is familiarly called, has a big grip full of queer and interesting reminiscences of days that are past and gone, of men and women whose faces we have never seen, whose names only are remembered. He is an odd looking character of the typical hayseed variety, but it would not do for any one to run him on account of his looks. In the end he would feel sorry for "but-in." He went to school in the days where school teachers were scarce and school houses scarcer—days of goose quill pen, and the hickory withe, where ink was made from maple bark, alum and sugar—alum and maple to make the black the sugar to add the gloss. His quaint and humorous vernacular is the best part of him and in his youthful days was common with all the country folks around. It would have been a rare find for Mark Twain about the time Huckleberry Finn was being evolved from the mind of the master humorist. He has a head chucked full of common sense and rugged business acumen, the exercise of which in business affairs in the last few years has placed him on the sunny side of easy street.

No. 55 on last Weduesday killed a fine milk cow belonging to Mrs. Wm. Price.

FIRE AT BUCKHANNON

Main Building Of Conference Seminary Burned Last Saturday.

At Buckhannon, West Va., on last Saturday morning about nine o'clock the main building of the West Virginia Conference Seminary was totally destroyed by fire. The flames originated in the boiler room of the building, located in the basement, and were occasioned by the explosion of natural gas which had accumulated.

The building was several stories high and as a result of the fire a panic among the 400 students ensued. Several were compelled to jump from the third story windows into a net; two were slightly hurt.

The school is owned and under the control of the West Virginia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. The building was valued at $60,000; insurance $30,000.

Among the scholars attending it from Garrett county are Messrs. Wallace and Lee R. Mason, of Oakland; George W. Moon, of Sang Run: Jacob H. Cuppett, of Mountain Lake Park, and a son of Mr. William H. Barnard, of near Mountain Lake Park.

No interruption of studies ensued as a result of the fire.

ANOTHER PIONEER DEPARTS.

Mr. Simeon W. Green Passes Away At An Advanced Age.

Sunday morning last, after a protracted illness, Mr. Simeon Ward Green, one of the oldest and most highly respected farmers of this community, died at his home on the Green Farm, Laurel Run, Garrett county, aged 94 years, 10 months and 21 days. Mr. Green was a prosperous farmer and timber dealer and was well known to all the people in this section of Allegany and Garrett counties.

Mr. Green was born March 3, 1830, on the place known as the old Green Farm on Laurel Run. He resided in Allegany and Garrett counties all his life, with the exception of one year, which he spent in Illinois. He was married in 1856 to Miss Eliza E. Broadwater. To this union there were ten children, three daughters, Mrs. Joseph Goodwin, Mrs. William Whiteman and Mrs. William Cutter, and seven sons, Messrs. William H., Benj. F., Horace J. Simeon A., Chester C., Charles A., and Rev. John T. Green, all of whom are living and residing within a radius of five miles, except ing Charles A. Green, who is located at Bigelow, Minn.

The first election held in Garrett county after Allegany county was divided, was held in Mr. Green's house, which was district No. 16 at that time. In his days he taught school, and was the founder of the school, at the place where he resided up to his death. His sons all married farmers daughters, and his daughters all married farmers' sons. He resided on his farm where he died for the past forty years.

At an early age Mr. Green united with the Disciples and had been a member up to the time of his death. He was one of the principal founders and pillars of the Mt. Union Church, of which he was also a trustee, and his absence from the official boards will be keenly felt.

Deceased is survived by 46 grand children and 2 great-grandchildren. In politics Mr. Green was a staunch Republican.

The funeral took place yesterday afternoon, services being conducted by Rev. T. B. Digman, of the Brethren Church, of Berkley Springs, W. Va., who spoke from the text, Matthew VII chapter and 2 and 3 verses. The pall bearers were Messers. Hugh Weir, Wm. H. Jacobs, George Memillen, Philip Hansel, Ulysses Jackson, and Stanley Jacobs. Interment was made in the family burying ground on the home farm. The funeral was largely attended by persons from all parts of Allegany and Garrett counties.—Lonaconing Star.

An American Balaklava

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

July 30, 1864

[Copyright, 1904, by G. L. Kilmer.]

A WAR tragedy which deserves to stand in history as the "American Balaklava" was enacted at Petersburg, Va., July 30, 1864. Had the victims of the slaughter pen in the crater of Burnside's mine gone in mounted instead of on foot, and had the charging columns traveled 500 rods instead of 500 feet under fire," as in the case of the Light brigade, the parallel would have been closer, but in both cases somebody blundered, and the poor soldiers who could but "do and die" were hopelessly and needlessly sacrificed.

Burnside's mine was laid with extraordinary skill and labor directly under a Confederate fort which the defenders of Petersburg had constructed on a spur of the ridge sheltering the town on the east. The construction of that fort had been carried on under the constant fire of Burnside's guns, and the peculiar nature of its trenches, adapted as they were to shelter troops from falling bombs as well as from horizontal firing, had much to do with determining the result when Burnside attempted to carry that portion of the line by storm after exploding a mine under it to open a breach. The excavation for the powder chamber was made by extending a tunnel a distance of over 500 feet from a point within the Union trenches to a point under the center of the fort to be blown up. The laborers were coal miners belonging to the Forty-eighth Pennsylvania regiment. They entered latterly in the long, close gallery and carried all the earth out of the tunnel and chamber by hand. Toward the end of the task, which lasted a month, their strength was supported mainly by whisky. They became too weak to digest solid food. The digging had to be done with the utmost stealth to prevent betrayal by deserters and discovery by Confederate pickets and trench guards who lounged or slept overhead.

While the excavation of the chamber was going on under the fort its batteries were firing at intervals, threatening to cave in the roof on the heads of the miners below. No accident occurred, although the Confederates suspected the mine and attempted to balk the scheme by a counter mine. Finally the charge of 8,000 pounds of powder was securely packed in place, a spliced fuse was laid to the mouth of the mine and the order given to explode it at daylight on July 30. The Ninth corps, under Burnside, occupied the trenches on the right and left of the mine, and three of its divisions—white troops—were ordered to charge into the breach the moment the explosion took place. No preparation whatever was ordered or made by any commander of the forces, of the army or of the corps to facilitate the rapid execution of this charge.

It was at first intended to put a negro division in front of the charging column, but Grant overruled that because he feared it would be publicly condemned. Lots were drawn by the commanders of the three white divisions in Burnside's corps, and it fell upon the First, under General Ledlie. Ledlie was a man of intemperate habits. This is a matter of official record or I would not recall it. Grant told the committee on the conduct of the war that the chance fell upon the most unfit leader in the whole army.

When the mine exploded and it was time to go in, Ledlie, as I was told by officers of the division present, had to brace himself by holding to a sapling. While his troops were fighting in the "crater" he lay in a bomb proof in the rear, and his aids were compelled to run the gantlet of fire from the breach back to the bomb proof to communicate with him.

The soldiers of the leading division—General Ledlie's First division, Ninth corps—were conducted to their station in the nighttime through the covered ways and halted at the base of the high breastwork already described, where they lay under arms until daybreak. They were then massed in columns of regiments and had no liberty to move around and reconnoiter the best positions for scaling the wall, nor were they instructed how to act at the signal to go. All they knew was that a mine was to be exploded under the Confederate works—which many of them had never seen in daytime—and that they were to charge into the breach. The firing of the mine was delayed by a defect in the fuse, but it finally exploded nearly two hours late.

Meanwhile the Confederates were not napping. The fort itself was occupied by Captain R. G. Pegram's Virginia battery, and the trenches, which means the system of walled ditches, bomb proofs and other shelter for infantry on both sides of the battery, by the Eighteenth and Twenty-second South Carolina infantry. These men, numbering several hundred, were asleep, all except the sentinels, but they had had frequent warnings and were either careless or worn out with ceaseless labor and vigil. The battery and the sections of works adjoining on both sides were hoisted into the air, and 288 officers and men were buried in the debris. Their comrades who escaped injury fled the scene, and all the confusion given to the enemy by the explosion was confined to this handful. The Confederate division manning the works along the threatened crest had been aroused during the night and put under arms "ready to move at a moment's notice." It was well known in Lee's camps that Grant was up to something in front of Cemetery hill. He was reaching out for that height and within the preceding twenty-four hours had withdrawn heavy bodies of troops from the north side of the James and concentrated them in the vicinity of Burnside's lines. The existence of a mine being known to Lee, much could be conjectured, and his subordinates knew just what to do in an emergency like that of July 30.

The explosion, when it came, actually confused Grant's soldiers more than it did Lee's. They were in a state of feverish expectancy, and when the ground rocked beneath their feet and an immense mass of earth, timbers, cannon and men, enveloped in clouds of powder smoke and dust, suddenly leaped into the air and hung over them, as it seemed, ready to bury them in falling, hundreds shrank back appalled and unmanned. The leader of the First brigade, Colonel Elisha G. Marshal, leaped upon the wall and, waving a signal to his men, shouted, "Forward!" Officers and soldiers to the number of a couple of hundred joined him almost instantly, climbing the barrier by help of their bayonets and on one another's shoulders. The party dashed forward to the pit and there found a great hole, encircled by a wall made of the falling earth and debris. Marshal's brigade was quickly followed by General W. F. Bartlett's, and by the time the two commands had closed up on the designated spot the lines were hopelessly mixed. Astonishment, mingled with curiosity, then took the place of soldiery self control in a great measure. However, in response to the calls of their leaders, the men dashed into the pit and attempted to clamber up the side toward the Confederate lines. Some avoided the pit and rushed in among the bomb proofs.

Successively Potter's and Wilcox's white divisions and Ferrero's colored troops followed Ledlie's men, and in a short time the crater and the adjoining network of sheltering walls were packed with men standing too thick to move. Attempts were made by the officers to rally sufficient numbers to charge out and capture Cemetery hill, but in every case the brave men were driven back by the pitiless fire. In point of fact the Confederates held their best fire. They considered the Federal men in the breach as being hopelessly entangled and virtually prisoners. Colonel Willie Pegram's famous battery was dragged by doubled up teams to a height commanding the crater and ordered to stand ready with double shotted guns to repel further advance. Riflemen were likewise thrown around the breach at a distance of 100 to 200 yards, with orders to "keep down the heads" of the Federal men in and around the crater. In the pit pandemonium reigned. Men who were shot on the crest tumbled back upon the wounded already lying in torture at the bottom. The day was hot. Sulphurous gases escaped from the fissures of the mine, and there was no water to relieve the horrible thirst. The way back to the Union lines was swept by canister and was already corduroyed with Federal dead. Refusing to retreat, men in squads sought death by attempting to charge forward. Officers heroically threw away their lives by mounting the walls to inspire the men to move out and relieve the horrible jam in the pit. But nothing availed—nothing could avail. Lee's batteries and riflemen were masters of the situation. Burnside's corps was in a trap, and nothing but a wanton waste of life and a monumental fizzle could come of it. He lost nearly 2,000 killed and wounded and nearly as many taken prisoners when the Confederates advanced in a spirited counter charge. Who had blundered the record plainly shows, but it is my province to say merely how American volunteers faced the music like heroes and in the heat of battle and in the face of death proved themselves the bravest of the brave.

ANY SOUL TO ANY BODY

By William Cosmo Monkhouse

WILLIAM COSMO MONKHOUSE, English poet, novelist and art critic, was born in 1840 and died in 1901. For many years he was connected with the financial department of the British government. "He occupied an honored place," according to one authority, "among the minor English poets of the Victorian era, and he won some prominence as an art critic. He will be best remembered for his services to art."

So we must part, my body, you and I,
Who've spent so many pleasant years together!
'Tis sorry work to lose your company,
Who clove to me so close, whate'er the weather,
From Winter unto Winter, wet or dry;
But you have reached the limit of your tether,
And I must journey on my way alone,
And leave you quietly beneath a stone.

They say that you are altogether bad
(Forgive me, 'tis not my experience),
And think me very wicked to be sad
At leaving you, a clod, a prison, whence
To get quite free I should be very glad.
Perhaps I may be so, some few days hence;
But now, methinks, 'twere graceless not to spend
A tear or two on my departing friend.

Now our long partnership is near completed,
And I look back upon its history,
I greatly fear I have not always treated
You with the honesty you showed to me,
And I must own that you have oft defeated
Unworthy schemes by your sincerity,
And by a blush or stammering tongue have tried
To make me think again before I lied.

'Tis true you're not so handsome as you were,
But that's not your fault, and is partly mine,—
You might have lasted longer with more care,
And still looked something like your first design;
And even now, with all your wear and tear,
'Tis pitiful to think I must resign
You to the friendless grave, the patient prey
Of all the hungry legions of decay.

But you must stay, dear body, and I go.
And I was once so very proud of you!
You made my mother's eyes to overflow
When first she saw you, wonderful and new,
And now, with all your faults, 'twere hard to find
A slave more willing or a friend more true:
Ay—even they who say the worst about you
Can scarcely tell what I shall do without you.

TO FANCY

By John Keats

Ever let the Fancy roam,
Pleasure never is at home:
At a touch sweet Pleasure melteth,
Like to bubbles when rain pelteth;
Then let winged Fancy wander
Through the thought still spread beyond her:
Open wide the mind's cage door—
She'll dart forth, and cloudward soar.
O sweet Fancy! let her loose!
Summer's joys are spoilt by use,
And the enjoying of the Spring
Fades as does its blossoming.
Autumn's red-lipped fruitage too,
Blushing through the mist and dew,
Cloys with tasting: What do then?
Sit thee by the ingle, when
The sear fagot blazes bright,
Spirit of a winter's night;
Sit thee there, and send abroad,
With a mind self-overawed,
Fancy, high-commissioned:—send her!
She has vassals to attend her:
She will bring, in spite of frost,
Beauties that the earth hath lost;
She will bring thee, all together,
All delights of summer weather;
All the buds and bells of May,
From dewy sward or thorny spray;
All the heaped Autumn's wealth,
With a still, mysterious stealth;
She will mix these pleasures up
Like three fit wines in a cup,
And thou shalt quaff it—thou shalt hear
Distant harvest-carols clear;
Rustle of the reaped corn;
Sweet birds antheming the morn;
And, in the same moment—hark!
'Tis the early April lark—
Or the rooks, with busy caw,
Foraging for sticks and straw.
Thou shalt, at one glance, behold
The daisy and the marigold;
White-plumed lilies, and the first
Hedge-grown primrose that hath burst;
Shaded hyacinth, alway
Sapphire queen of the mid-May;
And every leaf, and every flower
Pearled with the self-same shower.

O sweet Fancy! let her loose!
Everything is spoilt by use:
Where's the cheek that doth not fade,
Too much gazed at? Where's the maid
Whose lip mature is ever new?
Where's the eye, however blue,
Doth not weary? Where's the face
One would meet in every place?
Where's the voice, however soft,
One would hear so very oft?
At a touch sweet Pleasure melteth
Like to bubbles when rain pelteth.
Let the winged Fancy roam,
Pleasure never is at home.

COMPLAINTS OF THE POOR

By Robert Southey

THACKERAY, the novelist, says of Robert Southey, poet laureate of England (born 1774; died 1843): "An English worthy, doing his duty for fifty noble years of labor, day by day storing up learning, day by day working for scant wages, most charitable out of his small means, bravely faithful to the calling which he had chosen, refusing to turn from his path for popular praise or prince's favor—I mean Robert Southey."

"And wherefore do the poor complain?"
The rich man asked of me.
"Come, walk abroad with me," I said,
"And I will answer thee."

'Twas evening, and the frozen streets
Were cheerless to behold;
And we were wrapped and coated well,
And yet we were a-cold.

We met an old, bareheaded man,
His locks were thin and white;
I asked him what he did abroad
In that cold Winter's night.

The cold was keen, indeed, he said—
But at home no fire had he;
And therefore he had come abroad
To ask for charity.

We met a young barefooted child,
And she begged loud and bold;
I asked her what she did abroad
When the wind it blew so cold.

She said her father was at home,
And he lay sick abed;
And therefore was it she was sent
Abroad to beg for bread.

We saw a woman sitting down
Upon a stone to rest;
She had a baby at her back,
And another at her breast.

I asked her why she loitered there,
When the night wind was so chill;
She turned her head, and bade the child
That screamed behind, be still—

Then told us that her husband served,
A soldier far away;
And therefore to her parish she
Was begging back her way.

We met a girl, her dress was loose
And sunken was her eye,
Who with a wanton's hollow voice
Addressed the passers-by;

I asked her what there was in guilt
That could her heart allure
To shame, disease, and late remorse;
She answered she was poor.

I turned to the rich man then,
For silently stood he;
"You asked me why the poor complain;
And these have answered thee!"

GOOD ROADS IN NEW JERSEY.

The recent death of the Hon. Henry I. Budd, Commissioner of Public Roads of the State of New Jersey, has again directed attention, especially in Maryland where the good roads movement is rapidly progressing, to the road system of New Jersey and the state measures that have made possible the excellent highways of which that state now boasts. As a pioneer in the construction of modern stone highways, New Jersey has through her past experience indirectly assisted many other states in building good roads, and the county residents of Maryland will find much encouragement and instruction upon this important subject in considering the great extent and cost of the annual road-building operations in New Jersey and the excellent returns in money, progress, and satisfaction which has resulted therefrom.

The growth of New Jersey has been due in a direct measure to her good roads. These induced occasion visitors from New York, Pennsylvania, New England, and other sections of our country to become permanent residents in the state. These persuaded others to follow them, and New Jersey drew brains, energy and capital of other states to within her borders. Today after persistent effort in the same direction—namely, good roads and more good roads—New Jersey though forty-second in area has twice as many miles of good roads as any state in the Union, and the prosperity of her people is thought to justify the expense which the roads have cost. Maryland is now to expend annually in the same direction a liberal appropriation of her state funds, and a benefit commensurate with the outlay may be expected as a result.

New Jersey's experience with her good roads has justified the passage in 1903 of a new state road law permitting an expenditure for good roads of $400,000. Marvland, by virtue of her new state aid road law will appropriate annually $200,000 for the same purpose. In the past ten years New Jersey has appropriated $1,515,168 and the counties have spent double this sum. In all there have been built and are now under contract over 960 miles of road, and there are outstanding applications for about 500 miles of road for which the state has yet made no appropriation.

Has this outlay been justified by the results? The willingness of the counties to pledge themselves for two-thirds of the cost would seem to answer in the affirmative. During the year 1903 New Jersey started over 70 different road improvements, aggregating 190 miles.

Nineteen counties took advantage of the state aid road law and petitioned for state aid, and only two counties in all failed to demand any portion of the appropriation. The counties prepare for most of their road building in the winter months and begin construction as soon as the weather permits, and the activity of some of the counties of New Jersey during this season is remarkable. Three counties of the state in 1903 completed 28, 15 and 12¼ miles respectively in addition to other roads under construction which were completed in the next year.

17 DEGREES BELOW ZERO.

Was the Record In Oakland Last Saturday Morning.

Last Saturday morning was the coldest experienced in this section for several years at which time the mercury at the Sturgiss Pharmacy registered 17 degrees below zero. The cold was of the creeping variety—no wind to stir it up and consequently one was surprised when the readings were made.

BLOOMINGTON.

The death of Evangelist Riley, of Baltimore, prominently identified with a spirited revival in the M. E. church of this place two years ago, is reported to have occurred sometime last week at the southern end of the W. Va. C. & P. R. R., where he was engaged in the construction of telegraph lines for the Western Union Telegraph Co. A long standing heart disease was the cause of his death.

Mr. Grant Harshbarger, who has been ill and confined to the house for the past two or three weeks, is convalescing rapidly.

Mr. Charles Mullen, of Hagerstown, Md., who is spending the winter with his father, Mr. Andrew Mullen, has been in Grafton this week on business.

Mr. Henry Sutton, a former resident of this place now of Cross, W. Va., was in town on Wednesday.

The miners of the Hampshire fourfoot out of respect to the memory of Lafayette McRobie, who was killed by a fall of bone coal and slate on last Friday noon, suspended work until Monday morning. A delegation of miners, as pallbearers, accompanied the remains to Oakland for burial on last Monday.

One of the greatest social events that ever occurred in the town of Piedmont took place in the opera house on last Monday evening. The members of Piedmont Aerie, Fraternal Order of Eagles, gave an anniversary banquet which was attened by two hundred birds. The opera house was handsomely decorated in the colors of the order, the beauty of the decorations being brilliantly illuminated by hundreds of tiny incandescent lights of different colors, red, white and blue predominating. The menu comprised all the substantials and delicacies of the season and was arranged on the banqueting boards in the most appetizing manner. The liquid refreshments ran all the way up from hot mocha and Java and extract of malt and hops to fine old Burgundy with whiskers on. The cigars were of the best Havana, twelve inches long, and produced nothing but red, white and blue smoke, this adding to the patriotic feelings that the surrondings naturally engendered. The toastmaster, Attorney Harry Drane, was a peach, fully ripe, hand picked from the topmost bough, of delicious flavor that suited the taste of members and guests. The cyclone orator and bald eagle of the Alleganies, Hon. David Dick, traveled all the way from Baltimore to be present at the banquet and added two and a half hours of his characteristic eloquence to the program. His efforts were fully appreciated and had the birds fluttering with enthusiam and excitement from the beginning to the end of his oration. Dick was the star attraction of the occasion and made a great hit with the Piedmont boys.

To Correct an Erroneous Impression.

We desire to correct the impression that has been made by the published account in these columns last week of the death of John Beachy at Grantsville wherein it was stated that Mr. U. O. Blocher refused to sell Beachy more laudanum the night preceding his death. The facts are that Beachy had procured the drug at some other place than that of Mr. Blocher, the latter refusing to sell him any even though requested to do so by the unfortunate man. This correction is made in justice to Mr. Blocher, who is one among the best citizens of Grantsville and his business methods above reproach.

Since putting the above in type this office is in receipt of the following letter from Mr. Blocher relative to the matter above referred to, which is self explanatory:

Editor The Republican,
Oakland, Md.,

DEAR SIR:—Referring to your article of last week concerning the death of John H. Beachy, said article being worded in a manner to lead many readers of your valuable paper to suppose that I had sold him some laudanum and refused to sell him more.

This unfortunate young man was not to my knowledge an habitual user of the drug and at no time durin his life did he ever purchase a penny's worth of it from me or at my place of business. The night previous to his death was the only time he ever asked me to sell him the drug and being emphatically refused he went elsewhere and made the purchase.

In justice to myself kindly give the above space in your columns.

U. O. BLOCHER.

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

We had hopes that the epidemic of scarlet fever had abated, but we have recently learned that Mr. B. T. Thrasher's family, who reside a short distance from town, are all down with this much dread disease and Mr. Thrasher was compelled to send for his his Allen, who was at work in Pittsburg, to come home to assist on the farm and help take care of the sick. We extend our sympathy and hope for no serious results.

The young ladies of Saint Mark's Lutheran church will give an oyster supper on Saturday, the 18th inst., at 8 o'clock p. m., in the town hall for the benefit of above church. The Deer Park Cornet Band will be present to enliven the occasion and as they have so kindly offered their services gratuitously, the young ladies will take a silver offering at the door of ten cent for the exclusive use of our musical friends, and they hope to see this festive occasion well patronized, and extend cordial invitations to Oakland, Mt. Lake, and Swanton to come and aid a worthy cause and at the same time partake of the toothsome bival and enjoy the music and social intercourse of our town's genial citizens of all churches and classes.

Mr. P. M. Stemple, of Morgantown, W. Va., spent a few days last week in our place and joined his wife, who had preceeded him, and made sale of his Frankville property at a fair price and had his assessments in this county readjusted. Mr. Stemple, until the past few years, was one of our most energetic and prosperous citizens and he still has considerable real estate in this county and many warm friends to greet him and wish him well in his beautiful home in the hospitable city of his adoption.

The sad news reaches relatives at this place that Mrs. Mary E. Balthis, nee Hendrickson, widow of the late Rev. M. G. Balthis, of New Market, Frederick county, Maryland, is lying in a critical condition at the Emergency Hospital in Frederick city, where she was placed for treatment for cancer of the stomach. Her brother, L. C. Hendrickson, of Washington, D. C., and her only son, Rev. J. H. Balthis, of the Methodist church, are both with her and have no hopes. Mrs. Balthis was born at Addison, Pa. Besides her relatives of Deer Park, she has many relatives at Petersburg, Morefield Listonburg; Romney, and Washington. She was a graduate of the "Pittsburg Female College," and had in the late Bishop Simpson a warm personal friend. She was a school mate of Mrs. Sulivan Johnson, nee Felicca Ross, a cousin of Mrs. Lou Waters and Mrs. Virginia Johnson of your town, and personally known to them as a friend in other days, as also to Mr. G. S. Hamill, Mrs. D. E. Offutt and others of your city.

Rev. Weigel, of Cranesville, W. Va., expected to return this afternoon to assisted Rev. P. W. Matheny in his meeting at the M. E. church. In his ministerial efforts of last week this gentleman impressed our people as a devout and talented young minister. We congratulate Rev. Metheny in securing such an earnest and able Divine. The services are growing in interest and a number of conversions are reported and many at the altar.

Mr. W. W. Thrasher is out after a week of sickness with quinsy and we are glad to meet and greet this genial and kind hearted neighbor, for he at all times has a kind word and backs his words with kind deeds.

A slight damage was sustained by the B. & O. at the tower just west of this place and opposite the hotel last Saturday by a train sidewiping one of the Deer Park and Altamont helpers, but no one was injured, and our good engineer, Mr. Hennen, was not to blame and so all are thankful.

Mr. S. P. Specht and daughter, Miss Nora, accompanied by her aunt, Miss Emma Glotfelty, and her brother James, visited friends and relatives at McHenry on Sunday last, and was caught on return by facing one of the most inclement days of the winter, a fine cutting snow driven by high winds from the east and the mercury at zero. But they enjoyed the ride and are gay and happy. Storms of winter have no terrors for these jolly people, and Mr. Specht loves to see and give them a good time, remembering we are never young but once.

Dr. J. W. Laughlin, of Mt. Lake Park, attended the funeral of Mrs. Wm. E. George Friday of last week. His wife and daughter, Miss Sadie, who have spent the past two months in Green county, Pa., have returned to their home and will enjoy the remainder of the blizzards at their cozy and comfortable home at the Park.

Fraternally yours,

RESIDENCE NEARING COMPLETION

A Modern Dwelling Soon To Be Occupied.

The residence of Mr. and Mrs. Fred T. Martin, on Oak street, is nearing completion and it bids fair to outrival many other modernly constructed houses in Oakland for dwelling purposes. Not onlyis it architecturally beautiful, but it is likewise fitted from cellar to roof with everything that is modern in heating and sanitary appliances.

Recently the REPUBLICAN, through the courtesy of Mr. D. E. Bolden, of the firm of D. E. Bolden & Co., the contractors who erected the structure, was permitted to view the interior of the building, and it was a very pleasingsight indeed. Enteringthroughthe front door one is confronted with the beautiful reception hall with the parlor and library lying to either side, both rooms of considerable dimensions. At the rear of the hall is the stairway, a model in every respect. In the rooms referred to are handsome tile and hardwood mantles with fireplaces of good proportions. On the first floor are also the kitchen, pantry, dining room and closets for china, etc. The second floor is beautifully arranged, looking to the convenience and comfort of the occupants, containing several rooms, linen closets, bath and sanitary rooms.

The building is heated with hot water and will be lighted by electricity.

The colonial style of architecture is combined with the present day style of building and the effect is marked. The walls are constructed of light brown brick.

Mr. Martin is very much pleased with the building. The citizens of Oakland would like to see many more of these modern residences built here.

Mary Yeast Compton.

Mary Yeast Compton died in New Philadelphia, Ohio, on the first day of February, 1905, in the eighty-fourth year of her age. She had been painfully ill for a long time, being confined to her bed for one year. Her death, although sorrowful to many, was a relief to herself and others.

She was the oldest child and daughter of Jacob and Sarah BrownYeast. She was born near old Grantsville in July, 1821, where she grew up to womanhood. She was married to Robert Compton something over sixty years ago. She leaves a number of children, grand- and great-grandchildren to share in their great loss. She and her husband moved to the place where she died in 1850. The husband came to his death in a shocking manner. During the night of the Presidential election of 1856, on his way home, he was waylaid and murdered and then his body thrown into a stone quarry where it was found the following day. No clue to the perpetrator of the foul crime was ever found. She remained a sorrowing widow for forty-eight wearisome years, with no wish for a change, though her widowhood began at the hopeful age of 35 years. Mrs. Compton and her husband were well known members of prominent families of Garrett county.

There are now but a few who remember Mary and Robert Compton. She made but one home-visit during her long absence of fifty-four years, that about twenty years since. Even the kindred of these once well known persons have become few in the original home places. OLD FRIEND.

Keeping Warm.

Many persons who suffer from cold extremities accept the discomfort as a condition which is natural, and therefore beyond their control. The remedy really lies with themselves, and does not consist in hugging the stove or staying indoors, or in any other artificial protection.

The reason one feels cold first in the extremities is not alone because they are the remotest points reached by the blood in its circulation, but also because they contain a network of the minute blood vessels known as capillaries, in which the blood current tends to stagnate. When this happens, the nerves, unwarmed by fresh blood, ache in consequence.

The small boy who leaves a warm house on a cold winter morning usually starts on the run, or romps about for a while in the snow. This activity gives such an impetus to his circulation by the rapid breathing which it necessitates that the boy is soon in a glow. Not every one can imitate the boy's activity or enjoy his fun, but all can imitate his breathing.

Breathing completes the circulation. The heart pumps the blood out through the arteries, which become smaller and smaller until they are microscopic. This may be in the wall of the heart itself or in the great toe, but wherever it is the blood current there becomes almost stagnant. It is as if a river had debouched into a broad lake. On the other side of the lake are the venous capillaries with which the arterial capillaries connect, and which carry the blood back to the heart. The question whether the blood shall stagnate here or be frequently renewed is, then, a matter of providing for its speedy entrance into the venous capillaries and its subsequent movement through the larger veins to the heart. This in turn is a matter of breathing, because breathing, by its suctionlike action—the so called aspiration of the thorax—accelerates the speed of the blood on its return to the heart. A deep breath thus makes influence felt at those distant points where blood is halting and nerves are tingling.

The rule for keeping warm is, therefore, first to clear the nose, and to breathe well, both deeply and rapidly.—Youth's Companion.

Run Down

THIS is a common expression we hear on every side. Unless there is some organic trouble, the condition can doubtless be remedied. Your doctor is the best adviser. Do not dose yourself with all kinds of advertised remedies—get his opinion. More than likely you need a concentrated fat food to enrich your blood and tone up the system.

Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil is just such a food in its best form. It will build up the weakened and wasted body when all other foods fail to nourish. If you are run down or emaciated, give it a trial: it cannot hurt you. It is essentially the best possible nourishment for delicate children and pale, anaemic girls. We will send you a sample free.

Be sure that this picture in the form of a label is on the wrapper of every bottle of Emulsion you buy.

B. & O. EXHIBIT AT MARTINSBURG.

Exhibit At St. Louis Fair Being Placed In Old Roundhouse There.

Mr. George Renner, of Chicago, one of the superintendents of the exhibits of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad at the world's fair in St. Louis, is just now engaged in a task which is only a little less in magnitude to the assembling of those exhibits at the exposition, namely, the storing of the thousands of the component parts of those exhibits in the vast brick buildings of the Baltimore and Ohio near the depot in Martinsburg, W. Va.

Mr. Renner has been there for several days superintending the construction of stalls and the fitting up of the buildings for this purpose, and has a force of men busily engaged in the big undertaking. After the exposition at St. Louis was closed the problem of caring for the wonderful exhibits of the Baltimore and Ohio was solved by the determination to ship the whole to the city for safe keeping until the proposed building in Chicago shall be ready for them, and as work on this building has not yet been commenced it is probable that that the exhibit will remain here for at least a year. It is expected that the city of Chicago will appropriate the sum of $500,000 for the erection of a building suitable for this big museum illustrating the progress of railroad travel and traffic, and when it is completed the exhibit will be erected therein as a permanent affair.

Through the courtesy of Superintendent Mack, of the Baltimore and Ohio shops The Evening World man was enabled to take a survey of the work now in progress and form some idea of the magnitude of the affair when it shall have been completed. The whole exhibit fills 52 cars and comprises every imaginable appliance of railroad construction and operation, from the first rail used by the first railroad and the imperfect switches, engines, etc., to the latest and most perfect locomotive used on the Baltimore and Ohio at the present time. The development of the railroad is illustrated in such manner as to instantly impress one with the tremendous strides made in this direction.

As an illustration of the different modes of travel and transportation in different countries, and the superiority of American methods, there will be shown side by side the team of oxen from Mexico, the pack mule from Palestine, the mule and burro from the United States of Colombia, the diminutive mule from Turkey and the llama from Peru, South America, contrasting ludicrously with the monster freight engine and steel car of this country. These animals have been mounted by a skillful taxidermist, and are startlingly life-like.

Among the exhibits is a 15-foot section of the first "T" rail ever made, this piece having cost $100, while other items include rails, switches, crossties, ballast, spikes, wheels, etc., from every country on the globe, showing the different methods of construction in the different countries. There will also be fac-similes of the smokestacks used on the earliest types of locomotives, huge unwieldly affairs showing in sharp contrast with the diminutive affairs now used by the highest type of locomotive. From Brazil there was sent a crosstie of solid mahogany, showing how cheaply that precious wood is held there.

One branch of the exhibit will contain a number of enormous pictures of scenes along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio, among them being Harper's Ferry and Washington, 25x10 feet, the Potomac between Brunswick and Point of Rocks, Locust Point, the Cheat river, and dozens of other picturesque sections. Other pictures will be those showing all the locomotives in use on the Baltimore and Ohio from the first ancient affair to the latest monster with twelve driving wheels at the Sand Patch grade.

One interesting feature will be missing, however, the model of the new union station at Washington, which the visitors to the St. Louis exposition will remember as forming one of the most pleasing features of the exhibit. This model is 40 feet long, and was torn down and stored in boxes, and will not be erected here owing to lack of room and the danger of injury. It cost $10,000, and is a beautiful piece of work.

The lighter portion of the exhibit will be placed on the second floor of the west shop, while the heavy portion, such as models, engines, etc., will be stored in the east roundhouse. It will take about six weeks to get the whole in shape, and in will then be in such position that visitors can view it and form an idea of how it looked at St. Louis. The value of the whole is placed at $500,000.

The engines and models have not yet arrived here, being held at Cumberland until the roundhouse here can be put in shape to receive them.—Martinsburg Evening World.

Mr. Alvin Getty came up from Cumberland on Saturday evening, and was the guest of his brother, Dr. O. G. Getty on Sunday. He returned home Sunday evening on Duquesne, being accompanied by his wife who had been visiting relatives here for two weeks.—Cumberland News.

Collector of the Port, Senator R. A. Rayenscroft, came up to Oakland from Baltimore last Friday evening and was here on Saturday where he attended the meeting of the Board of Directors of the First National Bank and attending to some affairs connected with the building operations under way for him by Mr. John Ault.

Easter does not come until April 23 this year. This is a very late date for it and many think that it means that we are to have an exceedingly late spring. They are mourning on this account. Those who have to foot the millinery bills don't care if the day is postponed until after the Fourth of July.

Small game and birds have suffered greatly during the cold weather and in face of the deep snowfall. Many birds have frozen and are found huddled together under bushes and logs. In some instances farmers are feeding the birds and this should be done by everyone who has the opportunity. Otherwise the country will be completely stripped of them this winter.

A telephone message to this office from Clarksburg, W. Va., asking to whom the contract for the new jail had been awarded Monday afternoon, was somewhat premature, the plans for the building not yet having been adopted by the County Commissioners. The Board will meet, however, on Tuesday of next week, when they will probably adopt plans for the structure, a number of architects having already submitted their plans for the building. These plans are of wide range, some having points of merit in certain particulars which are lacking in others.

TELEPHONE CABLE IN PLACE.

Connection of the Service Wires Will Be Made Into It This Week.

The cable for the Garrett County Telephone Company, which has been lying at the station here for several weeks waiting for better weather conditions to place it in position, was strung last Tuuasday and Friday on the poles erected for the purpose along Alder street. The work was superintended by an expert telephone lineman.

The service wires will be run into the cable this week with very little interruption to subscribers.

Childhood Days.

[Written for THE REPUBLICAN.]

Oh, bright and joyous childhood days,
With shouts of laughter, life so gay—
With ne'er a heartache, pain or sorrow
To cloud the days gone, or the morrow—
'Tis mother's kiss wiped all away.
With sleepy eyes and tired head
We cuddle down in our little bed
To rest with the angels bending o'er us
Until the day breaks bright and glorious.

* * * * * * * * * *

Just draw the curtain and stand aside—
Our childhood days you would not hide—
Yes, back they come, after years of pain;
Life's road, though rough, can no longer remain.
The dim eyes grow bright as their playmates they see—
And as the mother's kiss on the forehead is pressed
The heart aches and sorrows are put at rest
And the snow white head falls asleep on the breast
Of Him in whom all shall be blessed.

New Station at Swanton.

President Oscar G. Murray of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, in a circular issued yesterday regarding new stations to be built along the line of his road included one, a combination station and freight building, 16x40 feet, for the town of Swanton, this county, which is badly needed at that place. It is one of the original stations on the Seventeen-mile Grade and has always been without the requisite accommodations for the traveling public.

Mr. George W. Legge, Jr., since his resignition as one of the clerical force at the postoffice, has engaged in the life insurance business, representing one of the strong companies of the country. For the present he will have his office with his brother, Dr. John E. Legge, in the McComas building on Second street where he will be pleased to "talk insurance" with all who may call.

Capt. and Mrs. Simeon Taylor, of Cumberland, passed through Oakland Sunday evening on train No. 55 for a point in Texas where Capt. Taylor goes for the benefit of his health which has been poor for several years. He expects to remain there for an indefinite period. Mr. Taylor is one of the best known passenger conductors in the service of the B. & O., and is well known in Oakland and Mountain Lake Park where up to a few years ago he owned a summer cottage, which unfortunately was burned.

The following taken from the Grafton Sentinel of last Saturday, contains some good food for thought which every citizen of Oakland should take to heart and act accordingly:

By the time the city of Oakland has a few more fires she will have no need of the water works that have been in contemplation for several years past. The town will eventually burn up and water will not be a requirement to put out fires. While the fire of a few days ago did not burn very valuable property it endangered some of the city's finest buildings. Get water works, brethren.

Wanted—One hundred wives.

RAFO

By FRANK H. SWEET

Copyright, 1904, by Frank H. Sweet

A long line of bending figures passed up the gang plank into the hold of the vessel, then back by another plank to the wharf, where they again connected with the line, forming an endless chain. Each link was a woman, and upon every sloping back was a bunch of bananas.

At the wharf end of the gang plank a man gave a glance at the number of clusters, or "hands," upon the bunches as they passed and then called out their sizes in a singsong "one-half bunch," "one bunch," "two and a half," "two," "one and a half," "one," "one," "two," and another man with a book upon a board placed across a barrel marked them down.

In the hold two men directed the women where to place the fruit. Both of these were "conchs," one a rough, brutal looking fellow, who merely nodded directions and scowled, and the other a laughing, jesting youngster, who gave his orders by springing forward and helping each woman to deposit her bunch in its proper place.

Usually the women thanked him with looks or words, some of them adding, "You good boy, Rafo," or, "Ev'body goin' smile on you if you keep on like dis."

But one link of the human chain there was that did not thank him with looks or words either. She was old and shrunken, with covetous, suspicious eyes, and when Rafo sprang forward she always met him with angry snarlings and would never allow him to touch her bunch. But not a whit difference did it make to Rafo. His song or laugh went on just as light heartedly as ever, and when her portion of the chain came round again he was waiting, as usual, with his ready offer of help, his ready laugh and his friendly eyes.

Just behind the old woman circled a young girl, as young as Rafo, and beautiful in spite of her dark face and bare feet and tattered garments, in spite of her bare shoulders with their burden of bananas. She was always the link in the chain behind old Tamasa, her mother, and Rafo never had time for more than one swift glance into her eyes before Tamasa had deposited her bunch and whirled upon them with her hawk-like eyes.

It was just the same on shore at the Tamasa hut—the two links were always together. Tamasa loved but one thing in the world, her daughter Fana. Nothing was too good for Fana, nothing too high to be hoped for her. So Tamasa's keen eyes studied the youth whose gaze followed the link behind her in the circlings of the endless chain, and the result of the study was made apparent in open encouragement or harsh repudiation.

At the gang plank Tamasa's eyes were almost kindly, for Miguel, the scrutinizer of fruit, received 38 cents a day. But Fana's gaze at that point dropped resolutely to her feet, for Miguel was ill favored and morose.

In the ship's hold Tamasa's good nature changed to black looks, while Fana's gaze rose swiftly and sweetly and happily. Rafo received but 19 cents a day, but he was handsome and blithe hearted and straightforward.

Round and round circled the endless chain, bearing its stream of bananas from the wharf to the hold, and like alternating belts of sunshine and cloud changed the faces of old Tamasa and youthful Fana as they went from gang plank to hold and hold to gang plank.

Under ordinary circumstances the gang plank was amply wide for the loaded chain, but Rafo's unchanging politeness in the hold and Fana's persistent coldness at the plank had darkened more and more the tempestuous countenance of Tamasa until at last, just after they had passed the sullen Miguel, her resentment got the better of her tenderness, and she turned with a sharp reprimand.

But Fana had not yet raised her eyes from her feet, and the consequence of Tamasa's checking the regular motion of the chain brought them together and swayed the bunch of bananas from its delicate balance. Fana tried to right herself, but in vain. A moment later there was a loud splash in the water twenty feet below, accompanied by a scream from Tamasa, who was peering down with wild, frightened eyes.

Miguel was not ten feet away, but his face was sullen with resentment and anger, and he made no move. Then there were a swift rush from the hold and a second splash, and Rafo's head rose to the surface with a merry shout of encouragement.

A rope was dropped from the vessel, and even as Rafo's left arm encircled the girl his right hand shot up and caught it. Then he whispered something to her, and, with quick intuition and courage equal to his own, she placed her arms over his shoulders so as not to impede his movements, and then, hand over hand, he went up the rope until he could swing himself across the gang plank. It was a rare exhibition of nerve and muscle, and the spectators sent up an involuntary shout of appreciation—all except Miguel and Tamasa.

The old woman's face was drawn and tremulous, but the look she cast upon Rafo was as black as ever.

"Come, Fana," she whispered hoarsely, "we will not work any more today. We will go home and rest."

But Fana was leaning against Rafo, smiling happily. Instead of recovering from fright she was perfectly calm. Those few moments coming up the rope, borne by the strong, confident Rafo, had been the happiest of her life. And now, upheld by his encircling arm, she did not care if the whole world—and her mother, too—were looking.

"Fana!" sharply. "You must not stand like that. It is not proper. I will"—

"Let the little one rest," interrupted Rafo pleasantly. "Don't you see how weak she is. And I like it."

"You—like it!" screamed Tamasa, losing control of herself entirely. "You—you nineteen cent man! You grinner and jester! Oh, Miguel, come here!"

But, instead of Miguel, another man, a brisk young Englishman, pushed his way across the gang plank toward them.

"Rafo," he called imperiously. "Here, quick! I want to see you. I'm in a hurry. Oh, there you are," as he saw the group. "Well, I'm sorry to disturb you, but every second is precious to me now. I have an imperative summons to England to settle up an estate and will have to be gone two years or more. I want you to take care of my finca until I return. I've had you work for me, Rafo, and know you are perfectly honest and trustworthy. What do you say? Quick! I must get my things ready and take this boat back. You will know how to cut and ship the bananas, and I will give you $50 a month and pay all the expenses. And, oh, yes"—as he noticed for the first time the figure encircled by Rafo's arm—"this will be a good time for you to get married. There is a comfortable house on the plantation you can live in. What do you say?"

Rafo made him a low bow, showing his teeth. "Si, senor," he answered, "we will be married in twenty minutes, and you can leave in thirty—as soon as you have kissed the bride." And then his merry, infectious laugh rang out so heartily that all had to join in, even Tamasa.

An Observant Barber.

A weary looking young man dropped into an armchair in a downtown barber shop the other day and said sadly, "Shave."

"Yes, sir," replied the knight of the brush and blade, and he began to anoint the young man's face with lather. After a moment's reflection the barber asked, "Will you be offended, sir, if I were to tell you your occupation and a peculiarity of yourself?"

"Why, no," replied the wondering customer. "Let's hear it."

"Well, you are a bookkeeper by profession, and you are left handed."

The young man gasped in astonishment and asked the barber how he knew these facts.

For awhile the barber refused to tell the secret of his power, but he was finally induced to clear up the mystery.

"I know you are a bookkeeper," he said, "because your hair is stained with red and black ink back of your ear, where you have been in the habit of placing your pen. The fact that the marks are back of the left ear show that you are left handed, and the fact that you use red and black ink shows you to be a bookkeeper and not a clerk or a literary man."

The customer left the place marveling much at the simplicity of the methods of Sherlock Holmes.—Baltimore Sun.

Painful Photography.

A resolute young lady of five years found herself before the photographer's camera for the first time, says the Philadelphia Record. She had been posed along with the other members of the family and sat as rigid as a flagstaff, her big black eyes fixed with eagle gaze upon the camera. After the exposure had been made the others moved away, while she sat as still as a mouse and as brave as a lion, with every muscle at highest tension, her legs like two sticks, her hands tightly crossed, her chest up, the veins in her neck fairly bursting. She was so straight as to almost bend the other way. Fearing to hurt her feelings by laughing at the uncompromising rigidity of her pose and her searching stare into the camera, her mamma at length said, "Come, dear, with mamma."

The anxious child replied through her teeth so as not to interfere with her pose, "No; I ain't taken yet." It was some moments before she could be induced to budge, as she had a firm conviction that there would be some visible, tangible sign of the "taking." Great was her surprise a few days later when the proof arrived. She had been "taken" without so much as feeling or even knowing it.

TRUSTS AND POOLS

By JAMES J. HILL.
President Great Northern Railroad

THE most offensive word to the American people is "pool"—railway pool. Any administration or congress that attempts to LEGALIZE railway pools will be quickly turned out by an uprising of the people.

There is a very simple method of dealing with the trust question. Let it be made necessary for any industrial corporation that wishes to do an interstate business to secure a FEDERAL license, but before that license is issued the corporation must prove that its capital is REAL MONEY and based upon actual value.

A majority of trusts nowadays are the products of promoters who hastily gather in two or three concerns, whitewash them over and over again, issue sheaves of printed securities and carry them down to Wall street TO FEED THE LAMBS.

The general business of the country is not booming; it is only quietly and MODERATELY prosperous.

EVERY RAILROAD WOULD BE HAPPY TO HAVE REBATES ABOLISHED AND THE LAW AGAINST THEM ENFORCED. THE LAW NEVER HAS BEEN ENFORCED NOR ANY ONE PROSECUTED.

A pool is a game in which you hand over your property to another man to divide, a device by which a weaker concern seeks to obtain an EQUALITY with the stronger.

The inevitable law of nature is the survival of the fittest. You cannot change that law by legislation. It may work for a short time, but IN THE LONG RUN nature will triumph.

A RAILWAY POOL WOULD HELP ONE TOWN AND RUIN THE NEXT.

It is not the magnitude of a business that works damage. Has the enormous business of the Krupp company injured Germany? Can any one in this country point out an injury inflicted on the people which can be traced to the MAGNITUDE of the Carnegie company—mind, I say the magnitude.

The serious objection to trusts is the method of their creation—not for the manufacturing of any particular commodity, but for the purpose of selling securities WHICH REPRESENT NOTHING more than good will and the prospective profits to the promoters.

I do not include ALL trusts in this classification, but a large majority of them.

Any company desiring to do interstate business should be compelled to satisfy a federal department or commission that its capital stock was ACTUALLY PAID UP IN CASH OR PROPERTY at a fair valuation, just as the capital of national banks is certified to be paid up by the comptroller of the currency.

If a company claiming to have ten, twenty or fifty millions of capital desires to do business in Minnesota or California it is only fair to the business man of the state that he should know that the company's solvency and soundness have been passed upon by the federal government and that its capital is what is professed.

Germany is our most active and hardest competitor today in the markets of the world. That is because the German emperor never ceases, day or night, to work and press forward the best business interests of his country.

There has been some playing with fire in Washington, and they don't know just how to put out the flames.

We as a nation have been too ready to look to state and federal legislation for remedies which are BEYOND THEIR POWER to give. The laws of trade are as certain in their operation as the laws of gravitation.

YOU MIGHT AS WELL TRY TO SET A BROKEN ARM BY STATUTE AS TO CHANGE A COMMERCIAL LAW BY LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENT. LET US LEAVE WELL ENOUGH ALONE.

That which is good let us keep and that which can be made better let us approach with intelligence and work together for the accomplishment of results that will benefit not only one, but ALL THE STATES of the country, and in that way secure the prosperity of the individual and corporate interests as well.

The Artificial Creation of Life

By Professor A. P. MATHEWS, University of Chicago

LIFE originally HAPPENED. Life is made up of certain organic compounds. Certain organic compounds were made by nature; they could not be made by human beings. These compounds came together in some manner, and the result was life.

There are two facts which PRACTICALLY ASSURE us of the ultimate artificial formation of living matter.

These are that LIVING matter is every moment formed from LIFELESS matter in ourselves and all about us and that living matter must have begun to exist at some definite time in the earth's history and must then either have originated SPONTANEOUSLY or have come from space.

As there is no evidence that life exists anywhere in the universe but on our earth, and as there is no reason why, if seed from space reached the earth in the past, it might not do so now and NEW BEINGS constantly appear without earthly parents, which no biologist believes, it is more probable that living matter originated spontaneously from lifeless matter.

Fortunately there have been other lines of investigation which have modified this pangenetic hypothesis. Many different sciences have contributed to an understanding of vital processes.

To make living matter we shall not first have to make a living substance, for, as has been shown, no such substance probably exists, but we shall have to duplicate a reaction in which possibly several substances are concerned.

WHILE, THEREFORE, ITS ARTIFICIAL SYNTHESIS MAY BE LONG DELAYED, I THINK, FROM RECENT PROGRESS, WE HAVE EVERY REASON TO FEEL ENCOURAGED AND TO LOOK FORWARD WITH CONFIDENCE TO THE ARTIFICIAL FORMATION OF LIFE.

The Simple Life

By CHARLES WAGNER

Translated From the French by Mary Louise Hendee

CHAPTER I.

OUR COMPLEX LIFE.

At the home of the Blanchards everything is topsy turvy, and with reason. Think of it! Mlle. Yvonne is to be married Tuesday, and today is Friday!

Callers loaded with gifts and tradesmen bending under packages come and go in endless procession. The servants are at the end of their endurance. As for the family and the betrothed, they no longer have a life or a fixed abode. Their mornings are spent with dressmakers, milliners, upholsterers, jewelers, decorators and caterers. After that comes a rush through offices, where one waits in line, gazing vaguely at busy clerks engulfed in papers. A fortunate thing if there be time when this is over to run home and dress for the series of ceremonial dinners—betrothal dinners, dinners of presentation, the settlement dinner—receptions, balls. About midnight, home again, harassed and weary, to find the latest accumulation of parcels and a deluge of letters—congratulations, felicitations, acceptances and regrets from bridesmaids and ushers, excuses of tardy tradesmen. And the contretemps of the last minute—a sudden death that disarranges the bridal party, a wretched cold that prevents a favorite cantatrice from singing, and so forth, and so forth. Those poor Blanchards! They will never be ready—and they thought they had foreseen everything!

Such has been their existence for a month. No longer possible to breathe, to rest a half hour, to tranquilize one's thoughts. No, this is not living!

Mercifully, there is grandmother's room. Grandmother is verging on eighty. Through many toils and much suffering she has come to meet things with the calm assurance which life brings to men and women of high thinking and large hearts. She sits there in her armchair, enjoying the silence of long meditative hours. So the flood of affairs surging through the house ebbs at her door. At the threshold of this retreat voices are hushed and footfalls softened, and when the young fiances want to hide away for a moment they flee to grandmother.

"Poor children!" is her greeting. "You are worn out! Rest a little and belong to each other. All these things count for nothing. Don't let them absorb you; it isn't worth while."

They know it well, these two young people. How many times in the last weeks has their love had to make way for all sorts of conventions and futilities! Fate at this decisive moment of their lives seems bent upon drawing their minds away from the one thing essential, to harry them with a host of trivialities, and heartily do they approve the opinion of grandmamma when she says, between a smile and a caress, "Decidedly, my dear, the world is growing too complex, and it does not make people happier—quite the contrary!"

I also am of grandmamma's opinion. From the cradle to the grave, in his needs as in his pleasures, in his conception of the world and of himself, the man of modern times struggles through a maze of endless complication. Nothing is simple any longer—neither thought nor action; not pleasure; not even dying. With our own hands we have added to existence a train of hardships and lopped off many a gratification. I believe that thousands of our fellow men, suffering the consequences of a too artificial life, will be grateful if we try to give expression to their discontent and to justify the regret for naturalness which vaguely oppresses them.

Let us first speak of a series of facts that put into relief the truth we wish to show.

The complexity of our life appears in the number of our material needs. It is a fact universally conceded that our needs have grown with our resources. This is not an evil in itself, for the birth of certain needs is often the mark of progress. To feel the necessity of bathing, of wearing fresh linen, inhabiting wholesome houses, eating healthful food and cultivating our minds is a sign of superiority. But if certain needs exist by right and are desirable, there are others whose effects are fatal which, like parasites, live at our expense. Numerous and imperious, they engross us completely.

Could our fathers have foreseen that we should some day have at our disposal the means and forces we now use in sustaining and defending our material life, they would have predicted for us an increase of independence, and therefore of happiness, and a decrease in competition for worldly goods. They might even have thought that through the simplification of life thus made possible a higher degree of morality would be attained. None of these things has come to pass; neither happiness nor brotherly love nor power for good has been increased. In the first place, do you think your fellow citizens, taken as a whole, are more contented than their forefathers and less anxious about the future? I do not ask if they should find reason to be so, but if they really are so. To see them live it seems to me that a majority of them are discontented with their lot and, above all, absorbed in material needs and beset with cares for the morrow. Never has the question of food and shelter been sharper or more absorbing than since we are better nourished, better clothed and better housed than ever. He errs greatly who thinks that the query, "What shall we eat and what shall we drink and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" presents itself to the poor alone, exposed as they are to the anguish of morrows without bread or a roof. With them the question is natural, and yet it is with them that it presents itself most simply. You must go among those who are beginning to enjoy a little ease to learn how greatly satisfaction in what one has may be disturbed by regret for what one lacks, and if you would see anxious care for future material good, material good in all its luxurious development, observe people of small fortune and, above all, the rich. It is not the woman with one dress who asks most insistently how she shall be clothed, nor is it those reduced to the strictly necessary who make most question of what they shall eat tomorrow. As an inevitable consequence of the law that needs are increased by their satisfaction, the more goods a man has the more he wants. The more assured he is of the morrow, according to the common acceptation, the more exclusively does he concern himself with how he shall live and provide for his children and his children's children. Impossible to conceive of the fears of a man established in life—their number, their reach and their shades of refinement.

From all this there has arisen throughout the different social orders, modified by conditions and varying in intensity, a common agitation—a very complex mental state, best compared to the petulance of a spoiled child, at once satisfied and discontented.

If we have not become happier, neither have we grown more peaceful and fraternal. The more desires and needs a man has the more occasion he finds for conflict with his fellow men, and these conflicts are more bitter in proportion as their causes are less just. It is the law of nature to fight for bread, for the necessities. This law may seem brutal, but there is an excuse in its very harshness, and it is generally limited to elemental cruelties. Quite different is the battle for the superfluous—for ambition, privilege, inclination, luxury. Never has hunger driven man to such baseness as have envy, avarice and thirst for pleasure. Egotism grows more maleficent as it becomes more refined.

Do not the very sinews of virtue lie in man's capacity to care for something outside himself? And what place remains for one's neighbor in a life given over to material cares, to artificial needs, to the satisfaction of ambitions, grudges and whims? The man who gives himself up entirely to the service of his appetites makes them grow and multiply so well that they become stronger than he, and once their slave, he loses his moral sense, loses his energy and becomes incapable of discerning and practicing the good. He has surrendered himself to the inner anarchy of desire, which in the end gives birth to outer anarchy. In the moral life we govern ourselves; in the immoral life we are governed by our needs and passion; thus, little by little, the bases of the moral life shift, and the law of judgment deviates.

For the man enslaved to numerous and exacting needs possession is the supreme good and the source of all other good things. It is true that in the fierce struggle for possession we come to hate those who possess and to deny the right of property when this right is in the hands of others and not in our own. But the bitterness of attack against others' possessions is only a new proof of the extraordinary importance we attach to possession itself. In the end people and things come to be estimated at their selling price or according to the profit to be drawn from them. What brings nothing is worth nothing; he who has nothing is nothing. Honest poverty risks passing for shame, and lucre, however filthy, is not greatly put to it to be accounted for merit.

Some one objects, "Then you make wholesale condemnation of progress and would lead us back to the good old times—to asceticism perhaps."

Not at all. The desire to resuscitate the past is the most unfruitful and dangerous of utopian dreams, and the art of good living does not consist in retiring from life. But we are trying to throw light upon one of the errors that drag most heavily upon human progress in order to find a remedy for it—namely, the belief that man becomes happier and better by the increase of outward well being. Nothing is falser than this pretended social axiom; on the contrary, that material prosperity without an offset diminishes the capacity for happiness and debases character is a fact which a thousand examples are at hand to prove. The worth of a civilization is the worth of the man at its center. When this man lacks moral rectitude progress only makes bad worse and further embroils social problems.

This principle may be verified in other domains than that of material well being. We shall speak only of education and liberty. We remember when prophets in good repute announced that to transform this wicked world into an abode fit for the gods all that was needed was the overthrow of tyranny, ignorance and want—those three dread powers so long in league. Today other preachers proclaim the same gospel. We have seen that the unquestionable diminution of want has made man neither better nor happier. Has this desirable result been more nearly attained through the great care bestowed upon instruction? It does not yet appear so, and this failure is the despair of our national educators.

Then shall we stop the people's ears, suppress public instruction, close the schools? By no means. But education, like the mass of our age's inventions, is after all only a tool; everything depends upon the workman who uses it. So it is with liberty. It is fatal or life giving according to the use made of it. Is it liberty still when it is the prerogative of criminals or heedless blunderers? Liberty is an atmosphere of the higher life, and it is only by a slow and patient inward transformation that one becomes capable of breathing it.

All life must have its law, the life of man so much the more than that of inferior beings, in that it is more precious and of nicer adjustment. This law for man is in the first place an external law, but it may become an internal law. When man has once recognized the inner law and bowed before it, through this reverence and voluntary submission he is ripe for liberty. So long as there is no vigorous and sovereign inner law he is incapable of breathing its air, for he will be drunken with it, maddened, morally slain. The man who guides his life by inner law can no more live servile to outward authority than can the full grown bird live imprisoned in the eggshell. But the man who has not yet attained to governing himself can no more live under the law of liberty than can the unfledged bird live without its protective covering. These things are terribly simple, and the series of demonstrations old and new that proves them increases daily under our eyes. And yet we are as far as ever from understanding even the elements of this most important law. In our democracy how many are there, great and small, who know from having personally verified it, lived it and obeyed it, this truth without which a people is incapable of governing itself? Liberty? It is respect. Liberty? It is obedience to the inner law, and this law is neither the good pleasure of the mighty nor the caprice of the crowd, but the high and impersonal rule before which those who govern are the first to bow the head. Shall liberty, then, be proscribed? No; but men must be made capable and worthy of it; otherwise public life becomes impossible, and the nation, undisciplined and unrestrained, goes on through license into the inextricable tangles of demagogy.

When one passes in review the individual causes that disturb and complicate our social life, by whatever names they are designated, and their list would be long, they all lead back to one general cause, which is this—the confusion of the secondary with the essential. Material comfort, education, liberty, the whole of civilization—these things constitute the frame of the picture, but the frame no more makes the picture than the frock the monk or the uniform the soldier. Here the picture is man, and man with his most intimate possessions—namely, his conscience, his character and his will. And while we have been elaborating and garnishing the frame, we have forgotten, neglected, disfigured, the picture. Thus are we loaded with external good, and miserable in spiritual life. We have in abundance that which, if must be, we can go without, and are infinitely poor in the one thing needful. And when the depth of our being is stirred, with its need of loving, aspiring, fulfilling its destiny, it feels the anguish of one buried alive—is smothered under the mass of secondary things that weigh it down and deprive it of light and air.

We must search out, set free, restore to honor the true life, assign things to their proper places and remember that the center of human progress is moral growth. What is a good lamp? It is not the most elaborate, the finest wrought, that of the most precious metal. A good lamp is a lamp that gives good light. And so also we are men and citizens, not by reason of the number of our goods and the pleasures we procure for ourselves, not through our intellectual and artistic culture, nor because of the honors and independence we enjoy, but by virtue of the strength of our moral fiber. And this is not a truth of today, but a truth of all times.

At no epoch have the exterior conditions which man has made for himself by his industry or his knowledge been able to exempt him from care for the state of his inner life. The face of the world alters around us, its intellectual and material factors vary, and no one can arrest these changes, whose suddenness is sometimes not short of perilous. But the important thing is that at the center of shifting circumstance man should remain man, live his life, make toward his goal; and, whatever be his road, to make toward his goal the traveler must not lose himself in crossways nor hamper his movements with useless burdens. Let him heed well his direction and forces and keep good faith, and that he may the better devote himself to the essential—which is to progress—at whatever sacrifice, let him simplify his baggage.

INDIGESTION

"I was troubled with stomach trouble. Thedford's Black-Draught did me more good in one week than all the doctor's medicine I took in a year."—MRS. SARAH E. SHIRFIELD, Ellettsville, Ind.

Thedford's Black Draught quickly invigorates the action of the stomach and cures even chronic cases of indigestion. If you will take a small dose of Thedford's Black Draught occasionally you will keep your stomach and liver in perfect condition.

THEDFORD'S BLACK-DRAUGHT

More sickness is caused by constipation than by any other disease. Thedford's Black-Draught not only relieves constipation but cures diarrhœa and dysentery and keeps the bowels regular.

All druggists sell 25-cent packages.

"Thedford's Black-Draught is the best medicine to regulate the bowels I have ever used."—MRS. A. M. GRANT, Sneads Ferry, N. C.

SOME REASONS WHY PEOPLE ARE SETTLING IN MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA.

Because it is the best country known to the man of moderate means.
Because you will find a country of rich soil awaiting the settler.
Because there are uplands, prarieland, and alluvial river bottoms.
Because you can be certain of profitable returns from whatever you put into the soil.
Because the winter does not consume what the summer produces.
Because there are more and better opportunities for deversified farming than elsewhere.
Because the seasons are regular and no fear of crop failure.
Because the country is never scourged by cyclones and devastating storms and blizzards.
Because everything grown elsewhere can be produced here more abundantly.
Because truck farming is a success; products being early on the market obtain high prices.
Because no better fruit country is known, oranges, plums, peaches, pears, apples, grapes, strawberries, figs, pecans and other fully maturing.
Because there are more chances for profitable investment of capital than elsewhere in this country.
Because for healthfulness this section is unequalled on the face of the globe.
Because you have no long winter months to encounter, with no excessive dry heat in summer.
Because the climate is more uniform than elsewhere, no extremes of heat or cold.
Because you will find the as orderly communities as anywhere on this continent.
Because you will find the most open-hearted people on the globe.
Because education is paramount; public schools and churches of every denomination are to be found in all communities.
Because the railroad facilities of this section are unexcelled, a double tracked railroad traversing the entire length of both states.
Because really good lands are yet cheap.
Because the geographical location of these states gives them the best markets in the United States.

We secure land for home-seekers or for colonies. Write to-day for full particulars and letters from Northern farmers already located in the South.

...ery of the Locked Box Explained to Her

"WILLIAM," said the bride after they had returned from the honeymoon—they had been lovers from childhood, and she had been rummaging around among his effects—"what have you locked up in that long box with the brass padlock?"

His face flushed, and he made an effort to change the subject, but she insisted on having an answer.

"I want you to give me the key to that box," she said.

"But—but, my dear," he answered, "I haven't any key to it. I've lost it!"

"Then I'll have the locksmith come and see if he has any that fits it. You have no right to keep secrets that I may not share."

"But, darling, this is something that you wouldn't care to"—

"William Waddums, do you think I'm a fool? I shan't stay under this roof with you another night till I know what's in that box!"

"I assure you, my dear, it's nothing that you'd be interested in. Honestly I"—

"There's some woman mixed up in it!" she cried. "I'm going right home. Don't dare to touch me! Oh, oh, oh!"

She covered her face with her hands. The terrible thought was crushing her, and William Waddums, the wicked, wicked wretch, was afraid the people in the flat below would hear her wild cries of despair. So he opened the box and bade her look.

Then at last she knew what had become of all the impossible neckties that she had given to him as Christmas presents.—Chicago Record-Herald.

His Revenge.

"Henpeck is being avenged on his wife, all right."

"Why, I thought she was dead?"

"So she is."

"Then how does he make it?"

"She talked into a phonograph some time before she died and made him a present of the record. Now every evening he starts the machine to talking, then he upsets chairs, kicks the cat, strums on the piano, spits on the floor and finally goes out and leaves it talking while he slams the door and goes to attend a session of the All Night Poker club."—Houston Post.

Mistakes Will Happen.

The Clerk—Yes, sir. He said it was an excusable mistake.

The Boss—Ah, and he returned the difference to you?

The Clerk—No, sir. He said since it was an excusable mistake we ought to overlook it.—Catholic Standard and Times.

Knowing Johnny.

Johnny—Ma, I don't think pa's very smart.

Mamma—Why, Johnny, I'm surprised!

Johnny—Well, he ain't. He told you he got downtown without getting his feet wet, and I got mine wet before I'd got out o' the yard, and I had ar'tics on at that.—Boston Transcript.

Up to Date.

Friend—Going to dress for the ceremony after you get to the church! Why, I never heard of such a thing.

Miss Bullion—But, you see, on the way to the church I'm going to wear a special overgown so arranged that when the mob attack the carriage they easily tear off pieces of lace and ribbon.—Brooklyn Life.

Flim—Did Bangs strike any rich veins when he was gold hunting?

Flam—Well, rather. They were blue blooded veins. He married the daughter of a man that owned all of the mines in that section of Alaska.—Detroit Free Press.

A Romance.

A buttonhole with mournful voice
Bewailed his empty life;
A button just across the way
He wanted for a wife.

He loved her pretty, nodding head,
Her never ending charms,
And when by happy chance they met
He held her in his arms.

But life hung only by a thread;
She went despite his pains.
'Twas months ago—the buttonhole
A widower remains.

Cora Welch.

In the death of Cora L., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Brison Welch, of McHenry, which occurred Sunday afternoon at two o'clock the parents are bereft of a loving daughter and the surviving sisters and brother lose one dear to them. Miss Welch was a few months older than nineteen years; for the past two years she was a patient sufferer from the ravages of consumption, during which illness she was the recipient of the undivided love and care of her relatives. Her funeral took place from the M. E. church at McHenry on Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock, the services being conducted by Rev. Henry E. Friend, of Hoyes. Interment was made in the cemetery at Flatwoods.

Additional Equiqment at Election Station.

As soon as weather conditions will permit an additional boiler of 80 horsepower and engine of 100 horsepower will be installed at the electric lighting station in Oakland. An additional dynamo may also be put in later but this has not yet been definitely decided upon by the management.

The Misses Swink Entertain.

A number of the young friends of Misses Emma and Garnet Swink were entertained at cards by these popular young ladies last Friday evening at their home on Liberty street. After an indulgence of some time at cards, intermingled with other games, those present partook of a very pleasant repast which was served at midnight, when the games were again taken up. The Misses Swink proved themselves to be charming hostesses in a manner most enjoyable.

About twenty members were present and enjoyed themselves immensely.

For Sale—Tread Power.

Can use one, two or three horses, suitable for grinding corn on cob, sawing wood, shredding fodder, chopping hay or straw—in fact anything power may be attached to. The machine is almost new, in thorough repair and will be sold at a bargain. Farm work requiring use of horses operating it and the installation of a gas engine to take its place is our reason for offering it for sale.

Order of Publication.

Amelia E. Poling v. Isaac James Poling.
No. 1319 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett county, Maryland.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree, divorcing the plaintiff, a vinculo matrimonii, from the defendant.

The bill states that the plaintiff and defendant were married in the year 1873 and that about ten years ago the defendant abandoned and deserted the plaintiff; that the conduct of the plaintiff towards her husband has always been kind and above reproach and that the defendant abandoned the plaintiff without just cause or reason and that such abandonment has continued uninterrupted for more than ten years and is deliberate and final and the separation of the parties beyond any reasonable expectation of reconciliation; that seven children have been born to said parties as a result of said marriage, the oldest of whom is thirty-one years of age and the youngest sixteen years of age; that the plaintiff desires to resume her maiden name, Amelia Elizabeth Shirley, and that the defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a decree divorcing the plaintiff and defendant a vinculo matrimonii; that the plaintiff be permitted to resume her maiden name and for general relief and an order of publication against the absent defendant.

It is thereupon, the 21st day of January, 1905, by the Circuit Court for Garrett county, in Equity, ordered, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper, published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 4th day of March, 1905, give notice to the said absent defendant of the object and substance of this bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor on or before the 20th day of March next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

Science has developed something infinitely better than the old-style wrap or clamp.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" FENCES ARE WELDED BY ELECTRICITY.

This is the modern method of construction. Years of life are added through the elimination of serious fence defects.

A WRAP holds moisture, cracks the galvanizing and allows the water to attack the bare wire. A small amount of displaced galvanizing on "PITTSBURGH PERFECT" REINFORCES THE PROTECTION AGAINST RUST AT THE ELECTRICALLY WELDED JOINT; examine the joint.

STAYS CANNOT SLIP. They are always just where they were put. Stay and strand wires become one piece when the union is made. The fence is like a solid sheet of perforated steel.

Every Rod is Guaranteed Perfect.

Don't allow your prejudice in favor of the rapidly-declining and now antiquated methods you have heretofore known, to warp your good judgment.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" FENCES REPRESENT PROGRESS, because hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of standard material is daily welded by electricity.

The hoop on the average sugar barrel in the isolated country grocery store is an electrically welded product.

If your wagon was made in a large factory, its tires were welded by electricity.

You will find electrically welded hoops on ice cream freezers and washing machines, on many tubs and buckets. Examine them.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" fences are made by this modern, simple and marvelous process, producing "THE WELD THAT HELD."

MR. FARMER: LISTEN, NOW. Every agent handling "PITTSBURGH PERFECT" fences is authorized to guarantee this:

That the wires are not injured at the joints,
That the fence is perfectly adjustable to uneven ground.
That the stays will not separate from the strands.
That the fence is all right in every particular.

Could you ask any more definite protection? Your complete satisfaction is absolutely assured.

TO REMIND US OF GENERAL WASHINGTON

The Man First in War and First in Peace.

CAREER OF A GREAT LEADER

Born in Virginia—Schooled in Frontier Life—Became Fitted for Leadership in the Greatest Revolution of the World.

George Washington is the only American whose birthday is honored as a public holiday. He was born in Westmoreland county, Virginia, February 22, 1732. He was the son of Augustine and Mary Washington, whose ancestors emigrated to Virginia from England about 1657. His father being a planter, his early life was spent on the farm. He received such education as the poorly equipped country schools of the time afforded. He made the most of his opportunities and his exercise books are models of neatness and accuracy. While his mother was limited in the matter of education she was, nevertheless, a woman of culture and of great force of character. She inculcated those habits and traits of character which made the son famous and which served him so well in all the trying and important positions he afterwards filled as a citizen, as a soldier and as a statesman. In addition to the common school branches, reading, writing and arithmetic, he became proficient in a knowledge of surveying, and while yet a boy he was engaged by Lord Fairfax, an English nobleman, to survey a great tract of wild lands included in the Virginia territory. In this way he was given a knowledge of the frontier country and afforded an opportunity to become acquainted with the habits of the Indians. It it well to note that during his boyhood days he engaged in all those activites which were possible to make him strong, physically, mentally and morally. He was industrious, truthful, honest, economical and resolute. Those qualities directed attention to him and at nineteen he was made a major of the militia and at twenty-one Governor Dinwiddle sent him on a mission to the French posts on the Ohio. By his cool judgment and prudent conduct in Braddock's and Forbes' expeditions, and in his defense of the Virginia frontier, he won the confidence and esteem of the American people and was made a member of the Continental Congress of 1774. While Washington is not ranked as an exceptionally brilliant man. Patrick Henry pronounced him "for solid information and sound judgment unquestionably the greatest man on the floor of the Continental Congress." At 22 (1754) he commanded a regiment against the French, who had established themselves at Fort Duquesne (now Pittsburg) and held Fort Necessity against superior numbers until compelled to capitulate. The year following, when two regiments of regulars were led against Fort Duquesne by General Braddock, Washington volunteered; and at the disastrous ambuscade of July 9, 1765, he was the only aide not killed or wounded. He had four bullets through his coat, and two horses were shot under him. The Indians believed that he bore a charmed life, and his countrymen were proud of his courage and conduct. Two thousand men were raised and he was selected to command them. In 1759 he married Mrs. Martha Curtis, a wealthy widow, resigned his military appointments, and engaged in the improvment of his estates, raising wheat and tobacco and carrying on brickyards and fisheries. He was for some years a member of the Virginia Assembly and rendered good service. Though opposed to the idea of independence, and in favor of a union with Great British so ardently desired by all British-Americans, he was ready to fight, if necessary, for the constitutional rights of the colonists. The news of the battle of Lexington (April 10th, 1775) called the country to arms, and Washington, then a member of the Continental Congress, was elected Commander-in-Chief by that body."

Note—The main facts of Washington's biography are so clearly brought out in school histories and other writings which are easily obtainable by both teachers and pupils that it is deemed unnecessary to reprint them herein.

That the troops may have an opportunity of attending public worship, as well as to take some rest after the great fatigue they have gone through, the general in future excuses them from fatigue-duty on Sundays, except at the ship-yards, or on special occasions, until further orders. The general is sorry to be informed that the foolish and wicked practice of profane swearing—a vice heretofore little known in an Awerican army—is growing into fashion. He hopes the officers will, by example as well as influence, endeavor to check it; and that both they and the men will reflect that we can have little hope of the blessing of Heaven upon our arms if we insult it by our impiety and folly. Added to this, it is a vice so mean and low, without any temptation, that every man of sense and character detests it.—General Order, August 3, 1775.

It would be peculiarly improper to omit in this first official act my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being Who rules over the universe, Who presides in the councils of nations, and Whose Providential aids can supply every human defect, that His benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes; and may enable every instrument employed in the administration to execute with success the functions allotted to its charge.

In tendering this homage to the Great Author of every public and private good, I assure myself that it expresses your sentiments not less than my own, nor those of my fellow citizens less than either. No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand which conducts the affairs of men more than the people of the United States. Every step by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation seems to have been distinguished by some token of Providential agency, and in the important revolution just accomplished in the system of their united government the tranquil deliberations and voluntary consent of so many distinct communities from which the event had resulted, cannot be compared with the means by which most governments have been established without some return of pious gratitude along with an humble anticipation of the future blessing which the past seems to presage.—Inaugural Address, April 30, 1789.

MARCH TERM JURORS.

Those to Serve In This Capacity Drawn Last Friday by Judge Henderson.

On last Friday morning Judge Robert R. Henderson came up to Oakland from Cumberland on judicial business, foremost of which was to draw the jury for service at the March Term of the Circuit Court, which duty His Honor performed during the day. The jurymen thus drawn are as follows:

WILL INSTALL IMPROVED PLANT IN THIS COUNTY.

Mr. George W. Kitzmiller's Coal Mining Proposition near Wallman.

HE HAS PURCHASED LARGE TRACT

Of Undeveloped Land and Twenty Dwellings Already On the Property—New Coal Separator Will be Placed at Mouth of Mines.

Mr. George W. Kitzmiller of Kitzmillersville, this county, has purchased all of the coal and mining rights of the Stover property located just above Wallman Station, Md., containing 520 acres also 300 acres from the "Manor Mining & Manufacturing Company," immediately adjacent thereto; containing in all 820 acres in one continuous body.

All the dwelling houses located in the vicinity of Wallman Station, now occupied by the Wilmore Lumber Company have been included in the purchase by Mr. Kitzmiller.

On account of the uniformity of the coal strata formation and its peculiar and favorable construction at this point permitting the development of two most valuable seams of coal without the expense of operating an incline to deliver the coal to the necessary shipping facilities or improvements, this can well be considered as one of the finest and most valuable self draining coal deposits for cheap mining to be found in the State.

Nearly all of the last mentioned tract, which has been purchased in fee, is covered with a fine second growth of oak and chestnut timber suitable for sawed lumber, railroad cross ties and for all mining purposes and other necessary improvements in connection with the mining operations.

In addition to the present group of some 20 dwelling houses included in the purchase, plans will be prepared for the construction of several additional new dwellings for the comfortable accommodation of mine workers, employes, officers buildings, improved loading tipple and all other necessary improvements for a well regulated mine operation and coking plant.

The peculiar fracture and general character of the seam more familiarly known as the "Split Six or Davis," which contains several slate partings and makes mining, quite difficult to clean and prepare the coal and by this increased effort required to clean the coal properly it is almost impossible to ship the product to market in such a condition of what is usually termed a "good run of mine coal," that to say, with a reasonably fair average of lump so much desired by the consumers.

In order to overcome the above objections, an improved coal separator will be constructed and equipped with the latest modern machinery known as the "Gig System" for separating the slate and other impurities from the coal by specific gravity, by which a great portion if not all of the impurities contained in the coal are removed, and by which all of the seam known as the 6 ft. or Davis, as well as any undue amount of impure slack coal from the several other seams on the property will be thoroughly washed and cleaned by the above method and together converted into coke; thereby improving any inferior or objectional grade of coal which may exist into a higher grade product, the result of which will no doubt be for the mutual benefit of both the operators and the consumer.

By reason of the favorable elevation and locatien of the line of out crop of the Davis seam, also the seam next above known as the Thomas 4 ft. will be brought direct from both mine entrances of the mine opening to the same landing at the exact heights, and deliver the coal into the proposed separator. After the coal passes through the cleaning process, the prepared product is delivered by natural gravity into a coal receiving pocket and drawn out by means of a chute into a self dumping car and transported to the proper coking plant erected for the purpose and located conveniently thereto as soon as the mine is sufficiently developed to justify the same; the elevation of the ovens to be so located as to permit the product ample gravity to deliver the coke into any of the largest capacity of steel cars on the main siding ready to be consigned and shipped to their destination.

The capacity of the proposed coal separator will be equipped and constructed in sections, of 200 tons daily, and as fast as the advancement of the mining warrants a duplicate plant can be really constructed without any special inconvenience or interruption to the existing or then present operation, and with no material increased capacity of the coking plant.

No doubt a great number of mechanics and workmen will find employment in the opening up of this new enterprise.

Mr. S. F. Shelly of Berkeley Springs, W. Va., at present Superintendent and General Manager of the Gleason Coal & Coke Company's new development located 1½ miles West of Harrison Station, W. Va., now about ready to ship coal to market, who is a practical miner and experienced prospector has taken charge of the development.

Mr. Shelly having designed, supervised the construction and successful operation of such a proposed coal separator plant under the "Gig System." is thoughly familiar with all the details in connection thereto.

Mr. William Harvey, Ex-County Surveyor of Allegany county, Md., has been employed by Mr. Shelly as Superintendent and mine Engineer, who has already taken charge of his new position, surveying and locating the new mine openings immediately below Wallman Station.

COURT SUSTAINS THE ROAD LAW.

Act Held to be Constitutional by State's Highest Tribunal.

APPEAL FROM BALTIMORE CO.

Decision a Help to Road Improvement. Of the Greatest Importance—State Appropriation for Roads Now Available.

The Court of Appeals upheld the validity of the Shoemaker road act in an order handed down this morning in the case of Mr. Frank A. Bonsal against the Baltimore County Commissioners. An opinion will be filed later.

This act provides for an appropriation of $200,000 for each of two years from the funds in the State Treasury to the different counties of the State to be used in building improved roads. The fund is distributed according to the road mileage in the respective counties.

Before any portion of the fund is awarded the county receiving it must agree to contribute half the cost of the contemplated improvement.

When the act was under consideration by the Legislature, doubt of its validity was expressed because of a provision of the Constitution of the State forbidding the use of public funds for internal improvement. In order to overcome this obstacle in case an unfavorable decision was rendered by the Court of Appeals, a constitutional amendment embracing the same provisions as the act was passed.

It will not, however, be necessary to submit this amendment for the approval of the people since the Court of Appeals has decided that the money can be contributed from the funds in the State Treasury.

Several counties have had their roads surveyed with a view of taking advantage of the offer of assistance made by the State as soon as the validity of the law had been established by the Court of Appeals.

Of the $200,000 appropriated by the act Garrett county is entitled to $12,000 or more each year, provided application be made to the State authorities for the fund and a like amount be appropriated by the County Commissioners each year to be applied on permanent improvements to our public highways.

Oyster Supper.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the Presbyterian church will conduct an oyster supper in Offutts' Hall on the evening of February 22nd. to which all are cordially invited. Besides oysters ice cream, cake and cofiee will be served.

Local Institute.

The report of the local Teachers' Institute held in Oakland last Saturday reached this office this morning just as the forms were being closed and consequently too late for publication in the current issue. The same will appear next week along with papers read before the institute by Miss Hopkins and Prof. J. Frank McBee.

PLANS WERE NOT ADOPTED

Tuesday by the Board of Commissioners for New Jail.

Mr. Holmboe, of Clarksburg, one of the members of the architectural firm employed by the Board of County Commissioners to draft plans and prepare specifications for the proposed new jail in Oakland, appeared before the Board at its office here Tuesday with preliminary plans and specifications for the building, but the same not meeting with the approval of the Board in a number of details the architect was instructed to draft new plans and submit the same at a meeting of the Board to be held on Thursday, March 2nd, when it is expected the matter will be definitely settled.

AWAY WITH YOUR POCKET GUNS

Judge Henderson Speaks Plainly About Carrying Concealed Weapons.

At Cumberland Judge R. R. Henderson Thursday morning heard the case of James F. Clark, an appeal from Justice of the Peace Wolford, who sentenced the accused to three month's confinement in the House of Correction, for carrying concealed weapons. After a review of the evidence in the case, Judge Henderson decided that the magistrate was right in finding Clark guilty and in sentencing him to the House of Correction. In confirming the sentence Judge Henderson took occasion to speak a few words of warning to all transgressors of the law against carrying concealed weapons.

The Judge stated that he never approved of what seemed to have been a custom among magistrates in imposing fines alone for offenses of this character, but he did approve of severe punishment in the way of imprisonment.

Judge Henderson further said that if parties brought before him were found guilty of carrying concealed weapons they would receive a prison sentence regardless of whether or not their standing in society might be high or low. Those who heard the remarks of the court looked upon them as a warning that the severest punishment may be expected for this violation of law, which is often responsible for high crimes.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there has come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hogs and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

To Make Forest Reserve of Potomac's Headwaters.

TO PROTERT WATER SUPPLY

Of National Capital—A Grand Scheme On a Grand Scale—To Solve Problem of Pure Water Supply—Will Cost Hundreds of Millions.

Washington, Feb. 10.—Representative Dovener, West Virginia, has introduced into the House a bill for the establishment of a national park and forest reserve in the Appalachian mountains.

The bill, which concerns Maryland, among others States, is as follows:

For the establishment of a national park and forest reserve in the Appalachian mountains, and to provide for the conservation of the water that flows down the Potomac water-shed, and to provide laws for its sanitaay policing, and so forth; to include all parts of the States of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia that contribute to form the complete water-shed of the Potomac river from its head to and including the District of Columbia; and for the primary purpose of providing a sufficient and pure water supply for the District of Columbia, to prevent overflows and denudation of soil; for the establishment of reservoirs, canals, lakes, ponds and ditches, and for all other useful purposes to which water can be put when provided with an abundance.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that a commission to carry out the aforesaid puposes by investigation and report, to consist of ex-officio the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, and Chief of United States Engineers, the director of the Geological Survey, the Chief of the Bureau of Forestry, and the chief engineers of the States of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and Pennsylvania, by consent of said States, be appointed by the President of the United States. Said commission shall have power to employ special expert engineers of national reputation upon water supply as they deem necessary, together with clerical forces and laborers as may be found necessary from time to time. And the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for the expenses of said commission; and said commission shall make final report within three years from the passage of this act and appointment of the commission, unless further extension of time, not to exceed one year, be allowed by the President of the United States.

Jesus At The Pool Of Bethesda.

Purim was a rollicking, boisterous festival, the Jewish carnival. Jesus showed his humanness by attending it. He believed that the Hebrews' escape from from Haman "should never be forgot." Putting Himself in sympathetic touch with the joyousness of the hour gave Him golden opportunity to declare Himself and His message. No doubt He went to those places where the people most congregated, but he also visited one place most neglected and shunned, the lazar-house of Jerusalem. He exchanged the chatter of merrymakars for the low, endless, pitiful wail of the congregation of cripples in the five porches of Bethesda. His errand was to both the joyous and the jejune.

With the practiced eye of a connoisseur of misery he parceled out the most abject, helpless, and hopeless case—one bedridden thirty-eight years. The mind sharing the paralysis of the body must be roused from its inane torpor by the electric shock of a surprising question. "Wilt thou be made whole?" is an electric volt. The startled man begins to apologize to his Interlocutor as if he were being found fault with for letting his opportunities pass. His answer reveals his extremity. He is not only sick, but friendless.

"Rise!" "Take up thy bed," "Walk!" are the imperatives of infinite power. The feeble human will is strangely energized. See a marvel! The withered limbs move. The soles of the feet are planted upon the ground. The man rises. He stoops, rolls up his mat. He walks!

The Pharisaical objection to the healed man carrying his bed on the Sabbath comes in like a burlesque. Unwittingly the cured paralytic sounds the note of contest between the young, reforming Rabbi and the venerable ecclesiastical establishment—a three years' battle—terminating in the bloody scene of Calvary.

Jesus had come to this feast with the set purpose to honor the ordinances of religion. But not less so was it His set purpose to break the traditions of the elders and the commandments of men. The scribes and Pharisees had taken the ceremonial law as a thread and had strung it full of the empty baubles of human ordinances. They were insincere and hypocritical. They heaped these intolerable obligations of their own devising upon the backs of other men, but they would not so much as put out the little finger to lift them for themselves. Jesus purposely crushed these empty and gilded beads of custom, but He never violated the law. He revered and kept it. He did this that all might see the difference between the commandment of God and the ordinance of man.

Jesus was after more important matters than the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin. He sought the weightier matter of the law—the evolution of moral and spiritual qualities in the human soul by means of which men deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly—the evolution of the kingdom of heaven within, whose essence is righteousness and whose cocomitants are peace and joy.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The classics are full of legends about fountains, but the Hebrew tradition of the "Fount of Miriam" surpasses them all in spiritual significance. The story is that this is the fountain from which the Jews drank in the wilderness. After they occupied Canaan its waters flowed into the Sea of Galilee, and at the end of every Sabbath these same waters flowed out and mingled with the waters of all fountains.

It matters little what feast this was. This important truth is that Jesus went up to every feast. He might have claimed exemption. On the contrary he could challenge his critics "Which of you convicteth me of the sin of ommitting a ceremony of the law?" Absentees from public worship find no encouragement in the example of Jesus.

On the other hand, extreme literalists, sticklers for technicalities, find no encouragement. Jesus was after substance, not shadow; spirit, not letter.

There is no lack of genuine sympathy with the individuals upon whom or for whom miracles were wrought.

Yet the average reader can plainly see the symbolism of this and also the following miracle. They are scenic, pictorial, designed to show Jesus' relation to the soul. In the one instance He makes Himself a Bethesde, a fountain of mercy for cleaning, and causes a well of water to spring up within. In the other He shows Himself the Bread of Life, while at the same time He feeds the hungry.

This miracle marks the beginning of official hostility to Jesus. Of set purpose He continues His benign work of healing on the Sabbath-day. There are six recorded instances and probably many unrecorded.

It seems like irony to ask a man to stand on legs unused for thirty-eight years, and to carry a bed on which he was always carried himself. But this is an instance of impartation of power to the powerless.

"Wilt thou be made whole?" The question was needful. Miserable, not always willing to be healed. Mendicants trade on their sores. Invalids traffic with the pity of their relatives. There are also "spiritual valetudinarians.

Crowding the pool is like frequenting the ordinances of religion. The Churches are full of spiritual paralytics. They do not doubt efficacy of grace, but have no expectation of themselves being made strong and useful.

Well Known Railroad Man Dead.

Mr. Daniel Cowan, for many years Supervisor of Engines and assistant Train Master of the B. & O. Railroad at Piedmont, died at his home in that city Thursday after several week' severe illness. Mr. Cowan's health had been failing for some time past and he had not been able to perform his duties with the B. & O. for some months. The funeral occurred at Piedmont, Saturday afternoon, at two o'clock, and interment was made there. There is by noploss railroad man in this section of the country better known than was Mr. Cowan, and hundreds of B. & O. employees will sincerely mourn his demise. Mr. Cowan's services to the B. & O. were always of a very valuable nature, and especially so in case of bad wrecks, the cleaning up of which he often superintended very efficiently and in a business like manner. He stood quite high in the estimation of B. & O. executive officials and was often seen with them on inspection or pleasure trips over the road. Often bluff in manner and at times apparantly hasty in his demeanor, he nevertheless possessed a very kind heart and has befriended many a man on his journey through life in a material way. The deceased was highly honored by all his townsmen and the funeral was one of the largest ever occurring in Piedmont.

ROAD 5,000 YEARS OLD.

The road from Homs to Hama runs almost due north a straight white line cutting across the geen fields. It is one of the oldest routes in the world. Caravans have been passing along it for at least 5,000 years, just as we saw them—long strings of slow moving camels with their bright colored bags of wheat.

One could almost imagine that Pharaoh was again calling down the corn of Hamath to fill his granaries against the seven years of famine. But even here the old things are passing. Just beyond the long line of camels was a longer line of fellah women, their dirty blue robes kilted above their knees, carrying upon their shoulders baskets of earth and stone for the roadbed of the new French railway.

The carriage road is French, too, and a very good road it is. Some men were repairing it with a most ingenious roller. It was a great round stone, drawn by two oxen and having its axle prolonged by a twenty-foot pole, at the end of which a barelegged Arab was fastened to balance the whole affair. If the stone had toppled over the picture of the Arab dangling at the top of the slender flagstaff would have been worth watching.

All along the road we were reminded of the east. It is a fertile soil, but the very wheatfields are different from ours. Only a few yards in width, they are often of tremenduous length. I hesitate to commit myself to figures, but it is certain that the thin, green fields would stretch away in the distance until lost over some little elevation. At one place the road was cut through a hill honeycombed with rock tombs which the haj said were Jewish.

Every now and then we passed a tel, or great hemispherical mound, built up of the rubbish of a dozen ruined towns, for even as late as Roman times this was a well cultivated and populous country. There is now no lumber available for building purposes, and in a number of villages the houses are all built with conical roofs of stone. Where the rock happens to be of a reddish tinge the houses remind one of nothing so much as a collection of Indian wigwams. Where the stone is white, as at Tell et Biseh, it glitters and sparkles like a fairy city cut out of loaf sugar.—Scribner's Magazine.

Dear Sir: A gallon saved is $4 or $5 earned.

Two gallons saved is $8 or $10 earned

Three gallons saved is $12 or $15 earned.

Four gallons saved is $16 or $20 earned.

Five gallons saved is $20 or $25 earned.

It costs $3 or $4 a gallon to paint, besides the paint; as much to brush on a gallon of worthless paint as Devoe.

Mr Ezra Rathmell, Williamsport, Pa, always used 11 gallons of mixed paint for his house; Devoe took 6.

FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR IN THE FAR EAST

Thus Far Russia Has Met With Remarkable Series of Reverses.

One year ago Monday the war between Japan and Russia began. On that day the Japanese Minister at St. Petersburg, M. Kurino, was withdrawn and the main fleet of Japan, under Admiral Hebatcha Togo, sailed from the naval base at Sasebo to attack Port Arthur and the Russian squadron at Chemulpo.

It will be recalled that the negotiations, the failure of which resulted in the war, were begun in July, 1903, when Japan besought Russia for a friendly adjustment of their mutual interests in Manchuria and Korea. Russia, preserving the semblance of peaceful intentions, agreed to take up the question, Japan asked:

1. A mutual agreement to respect the independence and territorial integrity of China and Korea.

2. Equality for the commerce of all nations in those countries.

3. Recognition of Japan's preponderating interests in Korea and of Russia's special interests in railway enterprises in Manchuria.

4. Recognition by Russia of the exclusive right by Japan to give advice and assistance to Korea in the interest of good government.

5. An agreement by Russia not to impede an eventual extension of the Korean railway into Southern Manchuria.

Russia delayed her answers and when she finally gave them, from time to time, they were worded in such a manner that Japan could get nothing satisfactory out of them. She made a counter-proposal that Japan recognize Manchuria as outside the Japanese sphere of influence and that a neutral zone, which would greatly restrict Japan, be established in Korea. As to Manchuria and the questions of the integrity of China and Korea, she held that her previous declarations to those two powers were enough. Meanwhile troops were being sent to the Yalu.

The negotiations dragged along from July, 1903, until February, 1904, and Japan was still unable to get satisfaction. The statesmen in Tokio at last came to believe that there was no hope and that Japan must either fight at once or wait for Russia to bring on the war at her own convenience. It was then (February 6) M. Kurino, the Japanese Minister at St. Petersburg, was withdrawn and Japan took steps to strike the first blow where it would be effective.

The results of the war's first year may be summarized as follows:

Destruction of the Russian naval power in the Orient. Only a few cruisers at Vladivostok remain of all the great fleet which the Czar had there in February, 1904.

Capture of Port Arthur after a seven months' siege.

Victorious advance of the Japanese army from Chemulpo through Korea and Manchuria to the Hun rivers 15 miles below Mukden.

Japanese occupation of Ninchwang and all Southern Manchuria.

The losses in men are conservatively estimated as follows:

Russians—20,000 killed or died of disease; 100,000 wounded; 30,000 captured (including 24,000 at Port Arthur.)

Japanese—15,000 killed or died of disease, 75,000 wounded; 1,000 captured.

Though Russia has been beaten so badly, there is no evidence that she has abandoned hope of final victory. The movements now in prospects are:

Struggle in the spring or earlier on the plains below Mukden, between the armies of General Kuropatkin and Field Marshal Oyama, who have about 300,000 men each.

Consolidation of the divisions of the Baltic fleet in the neighborhood of Madagascar and its movement to the Far East to dispute once more with Japan the question of naval supremacy.

Russia's present internal troubles have proved an important development which was not foreseen. But as the autocracy is still in the saddle, and its prestige is involved in the war, there is no apparent likelihood of its abandoning the conflict.

WASHINGTON NEWS NOTES.

President Roosevelt, who has among other freely expressed convictions of regarding no time like the present for work, may yet decide that an extra session of Congress in the spring for legislating on the railway rate question will be advisable. The general impression has been that an extra session would not be called before the early autumn, but no one realizes more keenly than the President how insistent the country has become in its demand that something should be done, and quickly, in the matter. If the extra session is postponed until fall, the result will be more killing of time, and possibly postponement of action for another year.

Persons deeply interested in the proposition to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix railroad rates, view with alarm the delay that is likely to take place before any legislation can be effected. With every week of delay the pressure on Congress from outside sources increases, and the problem of legislation grows correspondingly more complex. The New York Chamber of Commerce, one of the wealthiest and most powerful organizations in the United States, has opposed the proposition to enlarge the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates for the railroads, and in Iowa the Farmers' Alliance have hanged in effigy Congressman Hepburn, because of his attitude on the question.

Washington is overrun with representatives of the various railroads and also the agents of great industrial companies, all using the most powerful influence against and for the rate bill. Thus it will be seen that many cooks are helping to make broth which is likely to be spoiled or burned altogether. Congressmen who keep their ears to the ground, and the most patriotic American cannot deny that there are many such, find themselves cruelly confused by the various demands. The President, who has been eager for the Senate to act upon rate legislation at this session, has nevertheless acceded to their statement that it would be impossible, and he has made his official and personal plans with the view of the extra session in October, but realizing the importance of pushing the matter through at the earliest time, it may be that he will sacrifice his personal convenience and decide upon a spring session.

The season of resignation is at hand, and the Secretaries of the different government departments are daily in receipt of the resignations of men who preserve their heads from the axe by stepping down and out. During the next few weeks there will be a clearing in all the departments, and synchronous with the stock-taking of merchants will come the inventory of the capable material in the government bureaus. The cleaning up of the Postoffice Department has set an example for all the other branches of the government work, and wholesale changes are predicted. The work in the Postoffice Department, which has been carried on so actively ever since the death of Postmaster-General Payne, goes steadily on. Four letter carriers in the Toledo postoffice were dismissed this week for alleged connection with fake mining schemes, and thirty others are required to show cause why they should not also be dismissed from the service. This is but an indication of the purification of the department that is going on in all parts of the country, and when Mr. Cortelyou returns from Europe and takes charge the process is likely to be accelerated. Mr. Cortelyou, though a young man, has been tried in many capacities, and has not been found wanting. The public expect rather an unusual quality of ability in his administration of the Postoffice Department. With the retirement of Mr. Bristow, who was the only person who could have divided credit and authority with Mr. Cortelyou in the department, the latter will have a free hand to continue reforms, so ably inaugurated by Mr. Bristow. It is not often in any department that there can be found too many able and honest men, but it is clear that in Mr. Bristow and Mr. Cortelyou the Postoffice was embarrased with capable reformers. To Mr. Wynn fell the unpleasant task of making Mr. Bristow's place uncomfortable, and when Mr. Cortelyou takes charge he will have a clear field.

Senator Mitchell, of Oregon, who is under indictment for having received money for services rendered in having a land claim pushed through the department, is still in Washington, and continues to assert his conviction that he will be entirely cleared when the court meets in April. Senator Mitchell has not appeared in the Senate since he made his dramatic speech on the floor of the Senate and so positively asserted his innocence.

Agricultural interests absorbed the Senate on Thursday, and for once the farmer was the man of the hour. For almost an entire afternoon the Senate was engaged in a discussion of the policy of distributing ordinary farm and garden seeds from the Agricultural Department through members of Congress. Mr. Lodge and those wich him in the debate on the subject stated that the seed sent out were the common varieties, to be bought of dealers everywhere, and urged that only rare varieties should be supplied free to the people. He criticized the appropriation of $240,000 for supplying seeds which were of the cheapest and commonest varieties. He characterized the whole scheme as a humbug and added, "year after year we are appropriating the peoples money for the purpose of making gifts to our constituents. It is a pleasant thing to do, we all like to do it, but we should not forget that we are making the country pay for it."

Closing Lee's Bread Line

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

February 5-6, 1865

[Copyright, 1900, By G. L. Kilmer.]

GENERAL GRANT discovered in midwinter, 1865, that he had not cut Lee's bread line into Petersburg as effectually as had been supposed and on Feb. 5 sent out a detachment of infantry and cavalry to break up the Confederate wagon on route south of the besieged city. The winter of 1864-65 was unusually severe for the Virginia climate and bore hard upon the Confederate soldiers with their threadbare, insufficient clothing and meager food, the latter chiefly corn bread made of the coarsest meal. Of meat they got but little, and that was actually imported from Europe. The army hospitals had coffee and tea, but the troops in the field got none.

In a secret session of the Confederate congress it was stated at that time that there was not meat enough in all the south to supply the armies in the field and not enough in Virginia to feed the armies within her borders. The bread supply for Virginia camps had to be brought from other states and depended absolutely upon keeping open railroad connections south. The condition of the Confederate deserters who constantly came into Grant's lines early in the winter confirmed the statements before congress, but by the 1st of February it was found that Lee's supplies were better, and large quantities of meat and bread had been accumulated in Richmond.

Lee's supplies, brought from the south, covered the last stretch of the route on the Boydton wagon road by the way of Dinwiddie Court House, southwest of Petersburg. To intercept the trains and break up the route of supply General D. McAdam Gregg's cavalry division marched out of Grant's lines at 3 o'clock on the morning of Feb. 5 toward Dinwiddie Court House to intercept any wagon trains encountered and damage the enemy to any extent possible in that region. At the same time General G. K. Warren marched out the Fifth corps to co-operate with two divisions of the Second corps under General A. A. Humphreys in support of the cavalry. Warren and Humphreys were to operate about four miles apart, keeping in communication with each other and with the main army in the intrenchments, where General Nelson A. Miles remained in command.

Humphreys found the road in his front obstructed by fallen trees and held by a few Confederates, who were merely on the lookout and were quickly dispersed. After Humphreys had established his line and opened communications with Warren he learned from a reconnoissance that the Confederates lay in force behind some new intrenchments about a thousand yards from his front line. On the Confederate flank the troops were screened by woods, and the ground in front was swampy. A road led from the enemy's line over solid open ground to the center of Humphreys' position.

General Lee had been promptly advised of the movements of Grant's forces to the south and west of Petersburg and promptly concentrated parts of the corps of General A. P. Hill and General John B. Gordon to save his threatened bread line. The new Confederate intrenchments seen in front of Humphreys had sprung up in a night on the defense of the Boydton road between Dinwiddie Court House and Petersburg. A little after 5 p. m. on the 5th the Confederate artillery opened upon the center of Humphreys' line, held by the division of General Smyth, and their infantry, screened by the woods of Smyth's right flank, made a determined attack. Opportunely Humphreys had sent a fresh brigade to the right to support Smyth's flank, and a heavy and altogether unexpected musketry fire from that quarter threw the enemy into confusion, and the whole attack failed to shake Humphreys' line.

Although victorious in his first brush with the enemy, Humphreys prepared for another attack and called up a fresh brigade from General Miles and also sent word to General Warren to have General Gregg move to the left. Warren and Gregg had both passed beyond Humphreys' position, but without stirring up a serious fog. Both commanders turned about to join Humphreys, but before receiving the fresh other re-enforcements had come up from the main Federal lines at Petersburg, and Gregg and Warren moved on beyond Humphreys to threaten the enemy's right flank.

Finding that the march of Gregg and Warren in the new direction taken meant disaster to the line confronting Humphreys and also to his route of supply, General Lee dispatched the divisions of Pegram and Evans to avert the danger. Warren's advance division had a spirited fight at Dabney's Mills. This division, under General Crawford, first encountered an intrenched picket line of Confederates, which was handsomely carried by a charge of Bragg's brigade, the pickets retreating to Dabney's Mills. Rallying, the Confederates turned around and forced Bragg back, compelling Warren to send in two fresh brigades under General Ayres.

A line consisting of Bragg's, Morrow's and Baxter's brigades moved forward and again drove the Confederates back into a woods beyond a small cleared field. The fighting continued until Warren's men had fired away all their ammunition. General Morrow, one of the heroes of Gettysburg, was wounded. Meanwhile General Ayres had pushed forward rapidly, marching his troops by the flank through thick underbrush to a ridge where he suddenly encountered a body of Confederate cavalry. Brushing the cavalry aside and not halting to reform, Ayres pushed forward and swept over the Confederate intrenchments near the mill.

Up to this point the two Confederate divisions of Pegram and Evans had alone battled with the Federal divisions of Crawford and Ayres. Warren was getting the best of the affair, and General Robert E. Lee, who was on the field directing the operations, brought out the division of General Billy Mahone to try to turn the tide. Mahone led his men into an interval between Evans and Pegram, and the whole line rushed forward gallantly, pouring a terrible rain of bullets into the ranks of Ayres.

The Federals were not to be outdone in gallantry, but rushed forward in turn, and the firing line swayed forward and back until the ammunition of Warren's troops had all been fired at the foe. The Confederates had field guns in the fight, while Warren had none. When night came on and Warren saw no promise of aid he drew back his line and reformed ready for battle.

During the fight General Gregg brought up his cavalry on the flank, but was unable to make headway without the aid of the infantry. Finally, after the Confederate skirmishers had been brushed aside, Gregg's troopers advanced to the attack, but were roughly handled in a close fight with Mahone's infantry and driven back, the enemy at their heels. A fresh brigade sent in by Warren held up the Confederate advance. The Confederate General Pegram was killed in this last attack.

Although not brilliantly successful in fighting for the destruction of Lee's bread line, both Warren and Humphreys held on, and the army was permanently established in new works which extended the left flank of Grant's army nearer to the debatable ground. These lines were maintained until the arrival in March from the Shenandoah valley of Sheridan's mounted column.

The weather was very severe during this operation on the Confederate flank, and in reporting to the war department at Richmond what action he had taken to ward off the danger to his lines of supply General Lee wrote: "Yesterday, the most inclement day of the winter, they (the troops) had to be retained in line of battle, having been in the same condition the two previous days and nights. I regret to be obliged to state that under these circumstances, heightened by assaults and fire of the enemy, some of the men had been without meat for three days, and all were suffering from reduced rations and scant clothing, exposed to battle, cold, hail and sleet. I have directed Colonel Cole, chief commissary, who reports that he has not a pound of meat at his disposal, to visit Richmond and see if nothing can be done. * * * The physical strength of the men, if their courage survives, must fail under this treatment. Our cavalry has to be dispersed for want of forage. Fitz Lee's and Lomax's divisions are scattered because supplies cannot be transported where their services are required. I had to bring W. F. Lee's division forty miles Sunday night to get him in position."

It was a party of W. F. Lee's cavalry which suddenly rode against Ayres' column, as described above, during the successful attack on the intrenchments near Dabney's Mill.

The Need of Discrimination In Selecting Books

By LORD ROSEBERY, Ex-Premier of England

KNOWLEDGE is power, but that does not necessarily mean BOOK knowledge. Book knowledge is but a PART of the knowledge that constitutes power. Books are excellent things. It would be high treason were I to deny that. BUT A GLUTTONY OF BOOKS IS JUST AS BAD AS A SURFEIT OF ANYTHING ELSE. And there are a great many excellent people I know in this world who spend all their days in reading who are of no use to themselves nor to anybody else.

The fact is an appetite for reading WITHOUT DIGESTING is as unwholesome as any other form of gluttony. The man of vigorous life among men will beat the man of books always AND AT EVERYTHING in this world. Libraries, however, give them the tools with which they may work out their own salvation.

Mr. Gladstone, by the aid of immense industry, was perhaps the only man I have ever known who was able to adjust the balance between his life of study and his life of action satisfactorily to himself and to others.

But books can also be an end in themselves. The man with a happy taste for books can come in, tired and soured though he may be, and fall into the arms of some great author who will raise him from the ground and take him into a new heaven and a new earth, where he will forget his bruises and rest his limbs and return to the world a fresh and happy man. The best of that refreshment is that IT DOES NOT REQUIRE THE ASSISTANCE OF WHISKY or any other stimulant.

No limitation of means can in these days excuse anybody from not buying books, but I wish to distinguish between books to be read and books to be bought. READ IN ORDER TO SEE IF THE BOOK IS WORTH BUYING. There are two further classes of books—those that are borrowed from friends and returned and the books that are borrowed and not returned. This nonreturning of books has ended more friendships and terminated more affections than any other cause of which I am cognizant. The man who borrows one volume out of a set of books and never returns it is a man who should be treated like vermin—trapped or shot at sight or any other of the punishments which might be extended to the lowest and vilest of mankind.

My ideal index is one which will tell the best book to be read on any subject that might be asked for, but I fear nobody will be found to frame such an index, because his life would not be safe. But since this is unattainable there is another index which I am anxious should be found in our public libraries. I should like to see a committee appointed that will frame an index of books which have been superseded AND OF WHICH THE LIBRARIES MIGHT RID THEIR SHELVES. The great writers of old gradually disappear under the superincumbent—I will not say rubbish, because I am an author myself—but the superincumbent matter, just as Pompeii was shrouded by the ashes and lava of Vesuvius.

In literature we need one who shall act the part of the muezzin on the mosque summoning faithful Mohammedans to prayers, one who shall raise his voice and recall the names of the good books by good authors WHICH STAND IN DANGER OF BEING FORGOTTEN. I would think the evening of my life extremely well spent in trying to point out those authors who, in my judgment and in that of many better than myself, are in danger of being neglected in these days.

As an instance of one of the authors who have been unduly obscured of late years I may cite Sydney Smith, who is recollected by many as the sayer of some bewilderingly funny jokes.

I FEAR THAT UNDER HIS REPUTATION FOR HUMOR THE REAL MERITS OF THIS GREAT MAN MAY BE FORGOTTEN, FOR HE WROTE THE BEST SENSE AS WELL AS THE BEST NONSENSE IN THE WORLD.

Modern Tendency To Analyze Religion

By Rev. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS of Brooklyn

SOCIETY has passed through the era of criticism and analysis and is now becoming creative. WE HAVE BEEN IN A HOTHOUSE CONDITION TWENTY YEARS. We have analyzed the Bible and dogmatized the Bible and have had heresy trials that were more dangerous than Chicago fires, and we have asked questions and answered them. We have passed from THE OLD THOUGHT that the world was created in six days to the new thought that God is making a new world every moment.

At length we understand that God is not far off, that he is not to interrupt our laws with miracles, but that he is close to man and is living with him all the time.

ALL THIS IS THE RESULT OF SCIENCE. WE ARE AT THE BEGINNING OF ONE OF THE GREATEST CHURCHGOING EPOCHS IN ALL HISTORY.

Sacrifice In Marriage Brings Happiness

By Professor W. N. GUTHRIE, University of Chicago

MARRIAGE is not for happiness, BUT FOR SACRIFICE. Because marriage is for sacrifice it finally results in happiness. He who goes in for happiness as the PRIMARY factor in marriage will not find it.

One of the greatest faults of the present attitude toward marital questions is false modesty. Get rid of false modesty. THAT IS THE REAL CURE FOR THE DIVORCE EVIL.

It is a significant fact that at two recent general church conventions the subject of marriage was not discussed, while there was a great deal of discussion on divorce. Marriage is the important subject.

IF SOCIETY HAS THE RIGHT IDEAS ON MARRIAGE, DIVORCE WILL TAKE CARE OF ITSELF.

MONEY IN POLITICS.

It is an additional fact that the greatest source of corruption in the politics of the country is money. On the one hand, it is alleged that the politicians are responsible for this condition and they are charged with holding up and sandbagging the business interests. On the other hand it is alleged that the business interests are responsible and it is charged that they bribe leaders, bosses and politicians generally in order to get some favor or privilege which they ought not to have. However, this may be, all are agreed that the condition exists. What is the remedy? We have laws against bribery generally, against bribery of public officers, against bribery of voters, etc., but they all seem inoperative. At least they are powerless either to stop or check the corruption. In view of this fact and the further fact that no one seems ready with a remedy, we are emboldened to make two suggestions which we believe may have a tendency, if enacted into law, to better conditions.

1. Prohibit any corporation from contributing to the funds of any political party, or paying for any services which do not pertain strictly to its business and have its books open to examination by proper authorities so that it may be readily learned whether any contributions to political parties or any prohibited payments have been made.

2. Prohibit the bonding or mortgaging of any corporation on earning capacity and, to make this effective, make void all bonds or mortgages issued against the property of a corporation, over and above the actual value of the property.

These would be drastic remedies we know, but any remedies to be effective will have to be drastic.

School Literaries.

There should be in every community a well organized literary society. The work is important and the advantages to the youth are many. The boys and girls of the present will one day be the men and women of this great country and will occupy the positions of responsibility and honor in both church and state, and the educators should see to it that each generation, fills these places with a greater degree of efficiency and credit than the preceding one.

Since the aboye general principles are true we wish to apply them to our own county of Garrett.

Our Superintendent is greatly interested in literary work, yet his sphere of duty does not bring him in touch with it so directly as the teacher is brought day by day. It is, therefore, a part of our business as teachers to organize these meetings so as to incite healthy growth that develop the God-given talent in the bright boys and girls of this county. A successful literary society must do or be three things: first, it must be entertaining; second, it must be instructive, and third, it must be elevating. On these three points hinge the success or failure of a literary program. Hence we offer a few suggestions designed to be helpful to attain to the ideal.

An exercise must be entertaining in order to awaken interest, yet it is possible to have an entertaining programme and at the same time have a downward tendency.

We should guard most carefully the thought and language in writing our papers and in selecting our speeches and dialognes, and eliminate such as border on the vulgar and profane, and retain only those that instruct and elevate.

"A little nonsense now and then is relished by the wisest men," yet it is a mistaken notion that an entire programme must be "fun, all fun." It is well to have humorous selections, and there should be other selections of good solid merit developing the moral side of the mind, teaching the children to weigh and consider the serious problems of life which mightily concern their future career.

The great men and women who have blessed the conditions of society and elevated the race are the men and the women who were deeply rooted in those moral principles which serve as a bulwark in the moments of temptation and a refuge in times of danger.

If we neglect the moral side of our work the great fabric of education falls to the ground and will serve only as a net to entangle the feet of the future man and the future woman.

Much is being done for the moral side of education, yet there remains much more to be done. The soil yet unpossessed and untilled should be so cultured and developed that Sharon's plain will blossom with roses and lillies whose fragrance and sweetness and purity shall permeate every nook and corner of human society.

Such, dear fellow teachers, are the possibilities of education.

Died

SHAFFER—On the 12th inst., near Hauser, Garrett county, Miss Elmira Mariah Shaffer, aged 58 years, 1 month and 11 days. Early in life Miss Shaffer united with the Lutheran church during the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Cupp and was a faithful member of the Red House congregation to the time of her death.

She had been a great sufferer during the latter part of her life, but her sickness has ended in perfect health and after a lonely and wearisome voyage over the sea of time, she has entered the haven of eternal rest and is now enjoying the company of loved ones who have gone before. The funeral took place on the 13th from the home of Mr. Frank Mosser and interment took place at the Red House church amidst a large concourse of relatives and friends, Rev. E. Manges of St. Mark's, Oakland, officiating.

CONNEWAY—Daniel Conneway, a pioneer settler and highly respected citizen of Wilson, W. Va., died at his home yesterday at the age of seventy-one years. The deceased went to Wilson about 1840, when it was a wilderness and then a part of Allegany county. He took an active part in the development of what is now a prosperous lumber and coal producing region. Besides his wife he is survived by six sons and three daughters.

GARLITZ—At the home of her daughter, Mrs. C. B. McKenzie, near Avilton, this county, on Friday, Feb. 10th, 1905, Mrs. Ellen Garlitz, after a lingering illness of several months of old age and general debility. The funeral of the deceased took place from the residence of her daughter at 2 o'clock Sunday afternoon, the interment being made at Avilton, the Methodist minister officiating.

The deceased was the widow of the late Israel Garlitz and was well-known and highly respected by everybody who knew her.

Mrs. Garlitz was formerly a Miss Robeson and was born near Frostburg in 1828, residing in that vicinity for seventy-seven years. She is survived by several children. The deceased lost her husband several years ago.

Mrs. Garlitz was a remarkable woman for her age, being very active and was a very interesting and entertaining talker for one so advanced in years.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY HAS GONE ALL TO JERICHO

"Boss" Rasin, of Baltimore, Says It Has Gone to Smash and Must Be Reorganized or Go Out of Business.

I. Freeman Rasin, the Democratic boss in Baltimore, has broken silence and gave out an interview Saturday, of which the following is a part. He said:

"Why, the Democratic party has gone all to Jericho. But it is no funeral of mine. We have practically been out since 1895. I have had 40 years in politics and I have had enough. Let somebody else attend to all the little details."

"What is the future of the Democratic party in this city and State, Mr. Rasin?"

The chieftain drew a cigar from his pocket, clipped off the end methodically, and then lighting the weed he took several reflective puffs before answering. "The party," he said, "has gone all to smash. It must be reorganized or get out of business."

"Who will reorganize it?"

"That's not for me to say. There are people now holding important offices under the State administration who were never at Democratic headquarters in their lives. Possibly they will run it."

"How about Senator Gorman? Is he taking any active part in affairs at present?"

"Gorman will serve his term out in the Senate and quit. That's my opinion.

"I have seen him but once in almost a year, and that was at the Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York a few weeks before Christmas. He was there on private matters, and I was there with two of my daughters. We met accidentally and did not discuss politics, but of course some of the papers made a to-do about it, and had a lot of tommy rot about 'conferences,' etc. Mr. Gorman will be nearly 70 years old, when his term expires in the Senate, and I guess he'll want to retire."

"What do you think of the Municipal Voters' League, Mr. Rasin?"

"I don't know anything about it, and I haven't heard it discussed a great deal. This Governor of yours is mixed up in city affairs, and I guess a lot of the reformers will be for the League. Why don't they go ahead and put up a ticket and elect it instead of waiting for somebody else to do the work while they sit down and write letters to the papers telling how it should all be done?

"My experience with reformers is that they all want something and are hotter after the jobs than the people they abuse. I have never known a reformer that didn't end up by making a strong play for a fat job. Some of them want to go to Congress, others want to be judges, and still others would light on anything in sight."

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. and Mrs. James Green, of Baltimore, arrived in town on last Saturday morning. Mr. Green, on account of a business engagement, was compelled to return to the city on Sunday. His wife; formerly Miss Adah Harshburger, will remain a couple of weeks as a guest of relatives and friends.

Mr. John Miller, an enterprising business man, Freeland Tibbets, proprietor of the Free Sigh saloon and Adenai Paugh, of Frostburg, a guest of the former, went up on Hampshire hill in a big two horse sled on last Sunday to spend the day with Mr. "Jack" Kight. Notwithstanding the zero weather they reported a jolly good trip and a delightful time on the mountain top.

Saturday was pay day at the Buxton mine, Wednesday at Marstellers and as a result of good old fashioned Republican prosperity and a full dinner pail, our merchants had plenty to do and were correspondingly happy and contented.

Mr. Samuel Bartlett, of South Cumberland, was in town on last Saturday and Sunday visiting his afflicted brother-in-law, Mr. Thos. Conley.

Mr. George Oss, of Oss Bros., engaged in the lumber business on Savage river a few miles west of Everett's tunnel, was in town on Monday and reports the present winter the roughest he has ever experienced. He says Savage river is frozen to the bottom, only a small stream barely sufficient to water the stock, trickling under the ice.

Rev. Snedegar expects to dedicate the new M. E. church about the middle of March.

Mr. James Beard, our resident nurse, has been compelled to relinquish his care of Mr. Conley for the past week on account of an attack of rheumatism.

The engine on train 55 broke a tire on Tuesday afternoon, a few miles west of town; and was thrown from the track. Fortunately no other damage was done. Both tracks were blocked for a time and trains east and west ran from two to three hours ate.

SILVER SERVICE FOR MARYLAND.

Movement Started to Raise Funds for This Purpose.

A movement, having its origin in Baltimore, to raise funds with which to purchase and present to the new armored cruiser Maryland a silver service, has taken definite shape, the fund having been started with two subscriptions amounting to $120, and in nearly every county the spirit of the cause has been felt. In every section there prevails a desire as well as intention to go ahead with the subscriptions and assist in making the gift one of the most interesting features in the State's history.

In the Sunday edition of the Baltimore American interviews with the mayors of many towns in Maryland were published, among them being one with Mayor McComas of Oakland, which is reproduced below, the telegram being in the nature of a special dated on the 11th inst, as follows:

"Mayor Henry W. McOomas said this evening concerning the suggestion for the donation of a silver service to the new armored cruiser Maryland, that he is heartily in favor of the project, and will lend his aid to further the purpose. 'The people of Garrett are as much honored and feel as much interested in the cruiser and her performance as those near tidewater; said the Mayor, 'and we are all ready and willing to respond at the first call. Mayor McComas will take up a subscription at once, and is looking forward to a hearty response from everyone. Members of the Town Council also say that individually they indorse this expression of the Mayor."

While Mayor McComas has not yet solicited funds from any one for the purpose above set forth there is slight doubt but that he will be able to raise a very respectable fund toward the object. We should all be patriotic enough to contribute.

MARTHA WASHINGTON TEA.

At Offutt's Hall, Wednesday Evening, Feb. 22nd.

The ladies of the Garrett Memorial Presbyterian church will hold a Martha Washington Tea in Offutt's Hall on next Wednesday evening, Feb. 22nd. Supper and refreshments will be served from 6 to 11 o'clock p. m. The attendants will costume in the quaint style of Martha Washington's time and a cordial invitation is extended to all to attend.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Without saying a word to any person, Mr. Edward Sembower made a visit to West Virginia, and a few days ago returned here with a wife.

Miss. Mattie Watson and Miss Louise Watson returned to Fairmont, W. Va., yesterday morning.

Mrs. R. E. McQuay and Miss Annie, who have been visiting in Kentucky, returned to the Park Saturday last.

Mr. Sol. Harvey and family have moved to Hardman, W. Va., where Mr. H. has secured employment.

Rev. Cunningham is holding a revival meeting in the M. B. church. He expects the Rev. Mr. Clary, of Deer Prrk, to assist him the latter part of the week.

Mr. R. H. Gordon, who has been greatly improving his farm, lying between this place and Deer Park has placed two cars of building material for a "summer home," to be built in the early spring. There are several charming spots on Mr. Gordon's farm for summer residences with magnificent mountain outlooks.

Mrs. W. J. Hoopes, of Pittsburg, Pa., is visiting Mrs. Henry May at this place. Mrs. H. and family will spend the summer at the Park.

The coldest night of the winter was xperienced last Monday.

BITTINGER.

There are those who doubt whether the proverbial ground hog saw his shadow, but there can be no doubt that the Meat Trust Hog saw a shadew very recently, and it is evident that there will be something doing.

Mr. Jacob Gortner, who is employed in the lumber yard of Jennings Bros. at Jennings, Md., had a narrow escape with his life last Saturday morning. While at work at that place a large piece of timber slid down off the lumber dock and struck Mr. Gortner on the head, but fortunately he was but slightly injured.

Mr. William Ralston came up from Frostburg last Monday and will visit a few days with his mother.

Messrs. Simon Brenneman and A. J. Oester are putting the finishing touches to the Lutheran parsonage this week.

Our genial young friend Young Lohr, of Oakland, who is now employed by Jennings Bros. at their plant at Jennings, Md., is frequently seen in this village.

Mr. Amos Reckner and family, accompanied by Rev. J. B. Shoup, visted friends on Pea Ridge last week.

Mrs. C. E. Ellithorpe is reported ill at this writing.

THE WEBER PLANTATION.

A Correspondent of the "Florists' Exchange" Describes This Interesting Place.

Recently a number of florists residing in Baltimore visited the Weber gardens adjoining Oakland. One of the number in the current issue of the Florists' Exchange describes the visit and impressions made as follows:

"A number of the Baltimore craft visited Messrs. H. Weber & Sons at Oakland, Md., last Sunday. When we left Baltimore Saturday night the weather was clear and fine; when we arrived early the next morning at Oakland it was snowing hard; this, however, did not mar the pleasure of the trip. We were met at the depot and taken to the hotel for breakfast, after which we took a delightful sleigh ride of about a mile to the objective point. Messrs. Wm. and John Weber took us through and explained all points of interest, of which there were many. On leaving the office the door of a house 35x240 feet was opened, and we found ourselves in this large house filled entirely with the great My Maryland carnation. Many blooms were standing there on large, long, stiff stems, and not a bursted calyx to be seen. They have some 40,000 cuttings of this variety now in the sand, and are still putting in more. It was originally intended to send it out this year, but the firm has since decided not to disseminate it until 1906.

"The firm has more than 100,000 square feet of glass in all, mostly devoted to carnations; several houses were filled with seedings only, many of which will doubtless find their way to the market in the near future and prove valuable additions to the carnation family.

"There are six boys in the family, all actively engaged in the business, each carefully and energetically looking after their respective duties. Two of the sons, Henry and William, are married and have their residences on the estate (which is more than 500 acres). All the hay, grain, ect., raised on the place is consumed by the fifty head of horses and cattle, giving all the manure needed. Mr. Weber informed us that during the coming summer they will rebuild one block of about an acre and erect an additional new block for chrysanthemums.

"There are two water systems throughout the houses, one for liquid manure, the other for fresh water, which is supplied from a 40,000 gallon tank. The place is equipped with a sawmill and box factory for the exclusive use of their large business. They also have a large cut-flower vault. The major part of their products are disposed of at wholesale, the quality being such as to command the best prices. Just two miles east of their place is Mountain Lake Park, which is a great religious summering place. Three miles farther east is the popular and fashionable Deer Park these two resorts are heavy retail buyers during the summer season. The residence is very large and handsome, with all modern improvements, built on a hilltop overlooking a beautiful valley to the mountain beyond."

HUTTON

Mrs. Nye Devall (nee Jarboe) was visiting her sister, Mrs. C. F. White, last week.

The very severe and sudden change in the weather has caused an unusual amount of sickness in this vicinity.

The following gentleman were in town last Monday attending a business meeting of the Garrett Leather Company: R. E. Sliger and E. H. Sincell, Oakland; O. C. Crane, Terra Alta; Glen F. Barnes, Fairmont, and Frank Watts, Frostburg.

Both Dr. Legge and Dr. Offner, were visiting patients here at the same time on Tuesday.

Bunt Ballard, a roller at the tannery, was taken to the sanitarium at Oakland Tuesday suffering with a very severe attack of appendicitis.

Read Paper Before New York Florists' Club.

Mr. William Weber, of Oakland, a member of the firms of Messrs. H. Weber & Sons, went to New York Sunday night where on Monday evening upon invitation of the New York Florists' Club he read a paper on Carnations before that body, the occasion being the special carnation meeting of the club.

Mr. Weber took with him for exhibition purposes some of the new carnation grown by the firm which has been appropriately named "My Maryland." This new variety was recently awarded two medals and a certificate of merit by the American Carnation society in session at Chicago. Several other first and second prizes were awarded Messrs. Weber on other varieties of their product.

At the meeting of the American Society Mr. William Weber was re-elected a director for the term of three years.

Mr. Thomas K. Harvey, Jr., of near Kearney, was a business visitor at this office yesterday afternoon.

"CHANCING OFF" AGAINST THE LAW

Judge Keedy Calls Grand Jury's Attention to a Prevalent Practice.

Judge Keedy, in his charge to the Washington county grand jury, Monday, called attention to the practice of chancing off articles so prevalent in this community, but he forgot to read it at the conclusion of the regular charge, the paper being under some law books. He sent the note into the grand jury room later. The note follows:

"There is one other matter which I consider it my duty to call to your special attention.

"Judging from the newspapers and from what has been a matter of general knowledge and observation for sometime, there seems to have been an unusual number of articles of various kinds disposed of by chance.

"The scheme employed, which, in principle, is the same in all cases, constitutes a species of lottery and is in violation of the law.

'Sec. 280, Art 27, of the Code of Public Laws of this State, says: 'The courts shall construe the foregoing provisions relating to lotteries liberally, and shall judge all tickets, parts of tickets, certificates, or any other device whatsoever by which money or any other thing is said to be paid or delivered on the happening of any event or contingency, in the nature of a lottery, to be lottery tickets.'

"In the case of Bullock vs. the State 73rd Maryland, page 5, the Court of Appeals of this State, says: 'Our statute allows the sale of nothing which, on the happening or contingency "in the nature of lotterv," brings pecuniary benefit, which would not be enjoyed but for the chance falling to the holder. Courts are required by Sec. 184 to construe the provisions liberally in order to reach and suppress the evil, and they are required to hold "anything" to be a lottery ticket which, on the happening of such event or contingency in the nature of a lottery entitles the holder to money or property.'

"Further in the opinion of the court it says: 'Webster defines a lottery "to be a distribution of by lot or chance," a game in which small sums may obtain a larger value."

"The Court of Appeals of this state has discussed the subject in a number of cases and no purpose can be subserved by a reference to them at this time.

"Any information you may need upon the subject will be furnished you by the State's Attorney, or you may apply to the Court for such information as may become necessary your proper guidance in the performances of your duties."

Killed a Catamount.

Messrs. Edward Leech and D. W. Wilson, of Wilson, W. Va., started in pursuit of a catamount that had been terrorizing that neighborhood for some days and Mr. Leech succeeded in shooting and killing the animal, a very large member of the wild cat tribe.

SEED TIME

The experienced farmer has learned that some grains require far different soil than others; some crops need different handling than others. He knows that a great deal depends upon right planting at the right time, and that the soil must be kept enriched. No use of complaining in summer about a mistake made in the spring. Decide before the seed is planted.

The best time to remedy wasting conditions in the human body is before the evil is too deep rooted. At the first evidence of loss of flesh should be taken immediately. There is nothing that will repair wasted tissue more quickly or replace lost flesh more abundantly than Scott's Emulsion. It nourishes and builds up the body when ordinary foods absolutely fail.

We will send you a sample free.

Miss Tekla Johnson, who went to Parkersburg some weeks ago to visit relatives where she was taken seriously ill and remained under the care of a physician several weeks, arrived home last Sunday afternoon.

As committee for the late Solomon Tasker, deceased, Mr. William M. Junkins gives notice in this paper today to all creditors of the deceased to file their claims with him on or before May 18th, 1905.

County Surveyor Franklin P. Green and brother Chas. A. Green both of Moscow Mills, were visitors to Oakland last Saturday, the former having come to Oakland to make returns in some cases now in Court.

The final amounts subscribed for the fund to erect the Methodist church at Bloomington, are being collected, the church being nearly completed. The building is a very handsome structure and reflects credit upon the earnestness of the minister in charge.

Capt. Robert H. Gordon, of Cumberland, was in Oakland last Saturday on business. Capt. Gordon will build a summer residence on his farm adjoining Mountain Lake Park which will be occupied by his family as soon as completed. The house will be constructed with all modern conveniences and the location is an ideal one.

Miss Sallie Frazee, who has been spending a pleasant week with her brother-in-law, Wm. Morgan, Maple street, received a telegram this morning to the effect that her sister is quite ill. Miss Frazee left this morning for Selbysport, Garrett county, expecting to return shortly provided the condition of her sister is improved.—Frostburg Corr. Cumberland Times.

AGAINST INTENT OF DIVORCE LAW

Judge Keedy Calls Attention to a Practice That Will Not Be Tolerated

When A. S. Garis, attorney, called upon Judge Keedy at Hagarstown, on Thursday for the purpose of securing the signature of Judge Keedy to orders of publications in several divorce cases, the Court made reference in no uncertain terms to the practice of some lawyers taking their orders of publication to obscure papers in parts of the county where the parties interested have never lived and are unknown. Judge Keedy told Attorney Garis that this practice would have to cease, it being contrary to the spirit of the law, which requires that proper notice be given in such cases. In event one of the parties to a divorce lives in some section of the county outside of Hagerstown, it would seen to be in keeping with the intent of the law to have the notice inserted in a paper published in that section. The practice, however, of carrying a notice to some out-of the-way publication, with little or no circulation, simply to reduce the costs, the Court said would not be tolerated in the future.

Messrs. William and Ralph Weber, of Oakland who recently attended the annual meeting of the American Carnation Society held in Chicago, where they exhibited some of the product of the Weber gardens, captured six prizes, including the Lawson bronze medal and Society American Florists medal.

Dr. H. M. Kemp, of Bloomington, was in Oakland Tuesday and while here the editor spent a very pleasant hour with that gentleman in social intercourse. The Doctor, who is a cousin of Governor-elect William M. O. Dawson, related a number of anecdotes occuring while they were boys together at Bloomington, where both were born and reared.

On the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio the trainmen are now making a test of a new lantern and it is believed to be an improvement oves the ones in use at the present time. It is the Dietz tubular lantern and is devised so that the heat from the lantern is conveyed to the oil so that it will not freeze in cold weather. In the past the trainmen have been having an immense amount of trouble in this respect and a lantern which will prevent this will be very acceptable.

Two strangers arrived at the "Virginia House" on Monday evening, and registered as man and wife. The man walking from Oakland, and the girl, who afterwards proved to be another man's wife, arrived in town on the evening train. The next morning the enraged husband made his appearance, in search of his prodigal wife, but the young couple had fled to unknown parts before his arrival. The husband vowing that he would have them arrested, started after them in hot pursuit to execute his vow.—Gorman Corr., Keyser Echo.

When the frost is on the window and the kitchen pail is froze, when the little icicles come from every breath that blows, when the chilblains make us sick and faint and cold feet give us pain, it's safe to bet that we all wish for summer days again. For while we sweat and fume around in gauzy summer clothes, it's easy enough to get cooled off as everybody knows. But it's different in the winter time, for when the world is full of ice, the weather is as hard to beat as a pair of loaded dice. We may talk about our climate, our winter and our all, but the balmy days of summer are the ones that please us all.

MONEY FOR GOOD ROADS.

State Aid Machinery Has Been Set In Motion.

The Maryland Geological Survey Commission, which consists of Governor Warfield, Comptroller Atkinson, President Ira Remsen of the Johns Hopkins University, President Silvester of the Maryland Agricultural College and Prof. William Bullock Clark, superintendent, met Tuesday afternoon at the office of the Survey, on North Howard street, Baltimore, to set the machinery of State aid moving in favor of the county roads. President Silvester was absent, through illness.

There was much talk about ways and means and the manner of procedure, but the final action of the survey was embodied in the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That, as the Court of Appeals having decided that the State aid highway law (Acts of 1904, Chapter 225) is constitutional, we begin work at once under its provisions.

Further, that the boards of commissioners of the respective counties be notified that the State Geological Survey Commission will proceed in accordance with the circular already sent out, and that a second copy of these instructions be mailed to each board immediately, informing them that applications for State aid must be filed on or before March 1 next if it is their plan to take advantage of the law during the year 1905, and that any balance remaining to the account of any county and unapplied for on that date will be allotted to the other counties applying, in accordance with their public road mileage, as required by law.

Further, that the necessary surveys will be commenced as soon as practicable after March 1, and that plans and estimates will be submitted at the earliest possible day.

The circular of instructions sent to the various boards of county commissioners is as follows:

1. All applications for surveys of roads under the State Aid Road Law (Chapter 225, Laws of Maryland, 1904,) are to be made out on the regular blanks furnished by the State commission.

2. Applications must be signed by the County Commissioners, or when the control of the county roads is invested in other boards by the members of such boards.

3. All applications are required by law to be made on or before March 1, of each year. Those counties not so applying forfeit their apportionment for that year.

4. A separate blank must be used for each section of road.

5. The blanks are numbered consecutively, and the surveys and construction of the different roads will be pursued in the order of these numbers unless the county road officials designate in writing a different order.

7. If a blank is lost or destroyed, this office should be notified, and a new one will be issued on application. It is important that notice be given of the loss of any blanks in order that they may be checked off from the list of those issued.

7. Additional blanks will be furnished as needed at any time.

Governor Warfield and Comptroller Atkinson agreed that the money for State aid would be available during this year, and that, if not, the next Legislature would undoubtedly make the necessary provision. The County Commissioners will pay the full bills in the first instance and will not ask the State for reimbursement to the extent of one half until the work has been completed and the contracts fulfilled, and it is thought that this will extend the period of State payment until late next fall.

Ex-Sheriff Chas. Wegman, who is now located in Frostburg where he is engaged in contracting and building, in company with Mr. Olin Gerlach and Mr. James H. Fuller, also of Frostburg, were in Oakland Tuesday, the former to see many of his old friends and the latter to confer with the Board of County Commissioners relative to the plans for the proposed new jail.

NIGHT IS TURNED INTO DAY. . .

At The F. D. Brooke Photographic Studio In Clarksburg, W. Va.

The editor of this paper had occasion to stop into the Photographic Studio of F. D. Brooke, in Glen Elk the other day, and while there he was shown some photographs that were taken at night, NOT WITH FLASH POWDERS but with an especially constructed Arc Lamp of high candle power that Mr. Brooke has had made to his order that he may accommodate the large army of people who cannot get time in the day time to have photographs made. We were shown the apparatus and must say that it surpasses anything we ever saw for brilliancy in the rich actinic rays of light, and while it is so brilliant yet it is soft that it makes a nice soft light on the subject to be photographed thereby giving all the good results that can possibly be obtained in the day time and there is no shock nor scare as there is with flash light pictures. The specimens we were shown were the first he had made with the apparatus and show the same brilliancy of tone, definition and lighting that can be obtained with daylight.

Mr. Brooke has installed this apparatus at an enormous cost and we are sure his enterprise in doing so will only give him increased popularity with the people whom he serves, and the size of his trade already shows that the high class of work he puts out, and his refusal to degrade his profession and the reputation he has already gained for high class work, by putting out a cheap class of work, has won him and is still winning him many new customers.

The apparatus, used in conjunction with some other special apparatus also does his printing on the same HIGH GRADE PAPERS that heretofore could only be printed in strong daylight, and his work had to wait on the weather, now all this is changed. He can get out his work with promptness, regardless of the weather. We are sure it will pay you to call on him some night soon and inspect for yourself, as he is a most accommodating gentleman and will be glad to show you.

The work we inspected was the best by far that we have had the pleasure of looking at for many days. —Clarksburg Herald.

Messrs. R. E. Sliger and E. H. Sincell, of Oakland, Frank Watts, of Frostburg, and Glen H. Barnes, of Fairmont, were at Hutton Monday where they attended a business meeting of the Garrett Leather Company.

A Legal Tender Valentine

By WILLIS B. HAWKINS

Copyright, 1904, by Willis B. Hawkins

EDGAR WINSLOW, a stranger to most of the club diners, had been introduced by his friend, the toastmaster, as "our coming novelist" and had responded brilliantly to a trite sentiment. His was, beyond comparison, the speech of the evening, and nobody applauded it more enthusiastically than Mr. Barton, the banker. Later in the evening Mr. Barton sought an introduction and led Edgar to the reading room, where he might have him all to himself.

Winslow, mellowed by more wine than it was his custom to drink and tempted by the great banker's flattering interest, told much of his personal history and more of his ambition. He had really accomplished little as yet, he said—some short stories and a few verses in the magazines were the sum of his achievement—but he had long cherished the central idea of a novel which when written would, he hoped—It was profoundly impressive the way he modestly refrained from saying what he hoped.

Mr. Barton was more than ever under the spell of the young man's delightful enthusiasm—and the wine. Why was the great novel unwritten? The banker had his suspicions. He asked shrewd questions, adroitly invited confidences and at last convinced himself. Then, having fixed a date when Edgar should dine with him and his family, he reluctantly let the interesting guest rejoin the general company.

An hour or so later the banker, hat in hand, bade Winslow good night, handing him a sealed envelope with the request that he "look over this manuscript" when he reached home.

In his little hall bedroom late that night Edgar opened the envelope and found $500 in currency, accompanied by a friendly note which begged a thousand pardons, protested that the paltry loan was made in the interest of literature, expressed the hope that it would enable the author to write the great novel at once and assured him that Mr. Barton was his ardent admirer—Mr. Barton and, it might have added, to some extent the wine.

To the credit of his good sense be it said, Edgar did not deem himself insulted. If he felt a touch of mortification it was because he had invited this aid by talking too freely of his private affairs. But the question was, could he afford in the circumstances to accept the loan? He was shamefully in arrears to his kindly old landlady and knew that she needed money. There were other debts, too—a few small amounts advanced by friends who could ill afford such generosity. And then the chance to write the novel! He ended the controversy in his mind by resolving to send a promissory note to Mr. Barton, due on the 15th of the following February.

This seemed businesslike and, as he figured it, would give him time to write and dispose of the novel, for hope, you know, springs eternal in the literary breast, a fact which, by the way, is a great thing for literature.

Mr. Barton was a little ashamed of himself next morning. To be sure, the $500 was a mere vest pocket amount, but the principle of the thing was the same. He had let his emotions get the better of him in a matter of money, and that was not business. Moreover, he had invited an impecunious young fellow to dine at his house, and there was no telling to what annoyances that indiscretion might lead.

If the banker was a bit cool in his welcome when Edgar came to the dinner the young man did not notice it. His attention was too much absorbed by the striking beauty of the daughter who stood beside her father. The meeting of their eyes was like the touch of two electrified wires. In that instant a spark was struck which time was to fan into raging flame. Mrs. Barton, too, soon yielded to the spell of Edgar's winsome ways and, despite the mild cautionings of her husband, opened the door of her home to the charming young author.

As usual in such cases, the head of the house was the foot of the class in point of knowledge as to what was going on. It was only when Mr. Barton's consent was asked as a sort of formal ratification that he learned how far matters had progressed. Then he put his foot down. Young Winslow was well enough in a way—a very pleasant fellow, in fact, for once in a while—but—oh, well, he was not to be considered in any other light.

But he was considered, and amid copious tears at that.

"Why, my child," the banker said, softening under his daughter's grief, "he hasn't a dollar to his name. He can't even manage for one, to say nothing of two. He is living at this moment on borrowed capital, with no reasonable hope of being able to pay it back."

"Oh, yes, he has," Alviva answered confidently. "I know all about that $500, and you were a dear, good papa to let him have it. He'll pay it back, you'll see, and with good interest. Just wait till his novel comes out. Oh, papa, if you only knew how grateful he is to you!"

"Grateful or ungrateful, my dear," said Mr. Barton, "I don't believe he will ever pay it. How many of the novels written ever see daylight? Not one in a thousand. And of those that are published not one in a hundred yields anything for the author."

"But Edgar is different," the daughter persisted. "I am sure it will succeed. Oh, I wish you could hear him read it! You would say so yourself."

She regaled her father with portions of it that she had learned by heart, literally by heart. And her beautiful trust in the conquering power of the man she loved warmed Mr. Barton even more than the wine at the club dinner had done. To avoid being led to do something sentimentally foolish again he went away to think alone. And the wise result of his meditations was that he must convince his daughter rather than rule her against her convictions.

Winslow's note would be due in less than a month, and the banker knew enough of the situation to believe that it would not be paid at maturity. If it were not, then Alviva herself might see the matter in a more reasonable light. At any rate, she would be likely to accept the compromise of postponement. And there was hope in even that.

It was St. Valentine's day, but Edgar Winslow, standing in the morning by his hall bedroom window, was thinking of something more important than paper hearts. For weeks he had waited in painful anxiety for the verdict of the publisher to whom he had submitted his novel. Day after day he had watched the postman come and go, leaving nothing for him. On the 10th of February he had written an urgent letter to the publisher begging him to render his decision before the 15th, "for," thought he, "with the book accepted I can raise money on my prospects, and Mr. Barton must be promptly paid." Now it was the 14th, and still no answer had come.

A trilling whistle sounded somewhere up the street. Edgar raised his sash and leaned out at the window. Yes, the postman was coming his way. Would he pass? No; he turned in and rang the basement bell. The young author closed the window and hastened to the head of the stairs. The housemaid was coming up. How slowly she plodded! Winslow ran down to meet her, calling over the banister, "Anything for me, Mary?"

"Yes, Mr. Winslow, you an' me is the only ones that's got valentines, I guess. Look!" She had taken a gaudy "comic" from the envelope addressed to herself and was studying the verse beneath the hideous picture.

Edgar, all impatience, took the two letters addressed to him and, with a kindly word to Mary, sprang joyously up the stairs and shut himself in his room. With trembling fingers he tore open the envelope bearing the publisher's return card. The letter was short and to the point. The manuscript, the publisher regretted to say, was "not available." It would be returned by express that day.

For a long time Edgar stood looking vacantly out at the deserted street, with its deep drifts of snow, from which fitful gusts of wind swept up thin white clouds and hurled them hissing here and there. But the desolation in his breast was bleaker than that of the scene outside. He had done his best and failed. That was the deadening thought. He had put his very soul into this story—yes, and more; he had put somewhat of Alviva's beautiful soul into it, for ever since he had known her she had been not only his inspiration, but also the unconscious model of all that was lovely in his feminine creations. True, the limitations of language had confined him to the merest suggestion of those finer feelings to which he thrilled as he wrote, but he had done his best, and under the most favorable conditions possible. If this story was not worthy of publication he could not hope ever to write one that would be.

And Alviva! Was it farewell to her also? From the depths of his despair he tried to look the situation honestly in the face. Must she not now lose her confidence in his power to win the world, that simple, joyous confidence which had encouraged him sometimes to feel such boundless power within himself? Must she not now take him from the lofty pedestal on which her love had placed him? If so, then his life was not worth living, since its one great purpose for months had been to acquire, indeed, that nobleness of character which she in her sweet, unquestioning faith had ascribed to him.

In that hour of overwhelming distress he had forgotten the other letter. Now, however, he began tearing it open listlessly. Nothing, he thought, that anybody might have to say to him in a typewritten communication could be of the slightest interest now. Yet in the next moment he stood with a $500 bill in one hand, a plain leaf of paper bearing two typewritten lines in the other and a multitude of struggling emotions in his breast. Through a gathering mist in his eyes he read the two lines:

A friend who is not expert at rhyme
Begs you to accept this valentine.

To his mind there was something pathetic in the wretched lack of rhyme and rhythm, for it indicated to him only an innocent attempt of one unpracticed in the ways of deceit to conceal her identity. "God bless her!" he murmured fervently, kissing the page. "She shall never know how pitifully her little subterfuge has failed."

He spent the rest of the forenoon writing a long letter to Alviva. This was easier than to confess himself a failure to her face. He told her that some kind anonymous friend had sent money enough to enable him to pay his debt to her father, but that he must now cast about for employment. As for literature, that sweet dream was over.

Early next morning a messenger brought a hastily written note in which Alviva told him to be sure to call that evening and bring his manuscript. "Papa wants to hear it," she said.

When Edgar paid his debt at the bank that day Mr. Barton added his testimony to his daughter's, saying: "Come to dinner. Then we can get at the reading earlier."

"BY GEORGE!" HE EXCLAIMED.

In the library that evening the banker, with a good cigar between his teeth, leaned back in his great morocco chair and put an arm about Alviva, who sat on a hassock close beside him.

As Edgar, reading deeper and deeper into his story, began to feel the pleasure he had known in writing it his embarrassment departed, and his voice became rich with that melodious quality which had first attracted Mr. Barton at the club dinner. Then the scenes depicted, the characters brought out, the noble thoughts that strode through the tale, were all the more majestic because clothed in the garb of simple, unobtrusive language.

Mr. Barton's cigar had gone out. He leaned forward tensely. He was more than interested; he was fascinated. "By George!" he exclaimed as the reader rounded a climax. "Great! That's great!"

Edgar laid the manuscript aside.

"Go on," said the banker eagerly.

"Please go on, Mr. Winslow," Mrs. Barton added, with equal earnestness.

Alviva's bright eyes danced with the pleasure of pride.

The end of it was that Edgar read until after midnight, then left the manuscript with Mr. Barton, who said he could not go to sleep until he had learned how it all came out.

The next afternoon the banker met the head of the publishing house by telephonic appointment.

"Do you ever read manuscripts yourself?" Mr. Barton asked.

"Not often. Only in very special cases," the publisher answered.

"Well," said the banker, "this is a very special case. I wish you would read this one at once and send a b'll to me for your trouble."

In two days the publisher [illegible] the bank. There was no bill, however. On the contrary, the obligation was on his side, and he should like to make arrangements for bringing out the book at once.

"Do you know that your house rejected this manuscript day before yesterday?"

"Yes. I learned so this morning. The author seemed to be in unreasonable haste, and it was sent back without reading."

A few months later, when Edgar's fortune was assured, the banker listened to his plea and, with a merry twinkle in his eye, answered: "No, sir. You can't have her until you've paid back that five hundred."

"What five hundred?"

"The valentine I sent you."

"You, Mr. Barton?"

"Yes, sir, to be brutally frank about it, I wanted to see whether you were one of those geniuses who don't pay their debts when they have the money. Now, honor bright, Edgar, how much did you have left after you took up that note?"

"About $2."

"And no prospect of any more. Hanged if I think I'd have had the nerve to pay it under those conditions!"

"Nor I, perhaps," said Edgar, "if you had been anybody but Alviva's father."

The Simple Life

By CHARLES WAGNER

Translated From the French by Mary Louise Hendee

Copyright, 1901, by McClure, Phillips & Co.

CHAPTER II.

THE ESSENCE OF SIMPLICITY.

BEFORE considering the question of a practical return to the simplicity of which we dream, it will be necessary to define simplicity in its very essence, for in regard to it people commit the same error that we have just denounced, confounding the secondary with the essential, substance with form. They are tempted to believe that simplicity presents certain external characteristics by which it may be recognized and in which it really consists. Simplicity and lowly station, plain dress, a modest dwelling, slender means, poverty—these things seem to go together. Nevertheless this is not the case. Just now I passed three men on the street, the first in his carriage, the others on foot and one of them shoeless. The shoeless man does not necessarily lead the least complex life of the three. It may be, indeed, that he who rides in his carriage is sincere and unaffected, in spite of his position, and is not at all the slave of his wealth. It may be also that the pedestrian in shoes neither envies him who rides nor despises him who goes unshod; and lastly it is possible that under his rags, his feet in the dust, the third man has a hatred of simplicity, of labor, of sobriety, and dreams only of idleness and pleasure, for among the least simple and straightforward of men must be reckoned professional beggars, knights of the road, parasites and the whole tribe of the obsequious and envious, whose aspirations are summed up in this—to arrive at seizing a morsel, the biggest possible, of that prey which the fortunate of earth consume.

And to this same category, little matter what their station in life, belong the profligate, the arrogant, the miserly, the weak, the crafty. Livery counts for nothing; we must see the heart. No class has the prerogative of simplicity; no dress, however humble in appearance, is its unfailing badge. Its dwelling need not be a garret, a hut, the cell of the ascetic nor the lowliest fisherman's bark. Under all the forms in which life vests itself, in all social positions, at the top as at the bottom of the ladder, there are people who live simply and others who do not. We do not mean by this that simplicity betrays itself in no visible signs, has not its own habits, its distinguishing tastes and ways; but this outward show, which may now and then be counterfeited, must not be confounded with its essence and its deep and wholly inward source. Simplicity is a state of mind. It dwells in the main intention of our lives. A man is simple when his chief care is the wish to be what he ought to be—that is, honestly and naturally human. And this is neither so easy nor so impossible as one might think. At bottom it consists in putting our acts and aspirations in accordance with the law of our being, and consequently with the eternal intention which willed that we should be at all. Let a flower be a flower, a swallow a swallow, a rock a rock, and let a man be a man, and not a fox, a hare, a hog or a bird of prey. This is the sum of the whole matter.

Here we are led to formulate the practical ideal of man. Everywhere in life we see certain quantities of matter and energy associated for certain ends. Substances more or less crude are thus transformed and carried to a higher degree of organization. It is not otherwise with the life of man. The human ideal is to transform life into something more excellent than itself. We may compare existence to raw material. What it is matters less than what is made of it, as the value of a work of art lies in the flowering of the workman's skill. We bring into the world with us different gifts. One has received gold, another granite, a third marble, most of us wood or clay. Our task is to fashion these substances. Every one knows that the most precious material may be spoiled, and he knows, too, that out of the least costly an immortal work may be shaped. Art is the realization of a permanent idea in an ephemeral form. True life is the realization of the higher virtues—justice, love, truth, liberty, moral power—in our daily activities, whatever they may be. And this life is possible in social conditions the most diverse and with natural gifts the most unequal. It is not fortune or personal advantage, but our turning them to account, that constitutes the value of life. Fame adds no more than does length of days. Quality is the thing.

Need we say that one does not rise to this point of view without a struggle? The spirit of simplicity is not an inherited gift, but the result of a laborious conquest. Plain living, like high thinking, is simplification. We know that science is the handful of ultimate principles gathered out of the tufted mass of facts, but what gropings to discover them! Centuries of research are often condensed into a principle that a line may state. Here the moral life presents strong analogy with the scientific. It, too, begins in a certain confusion, makes trial of itself, seeks to understand itself, and often mistakes. But by dint of action and exacting from himself strict account of his deeds man arrives at a better knowledge of life. Its law appears to him, and the law is this: Work out your mission. He who applies himself to aught else than the realization of this end loses in living the raison d'etre of life. The egotist does so, the pleasure seeker, the ambitious; he consumes existence as one eating the full corn in the blade; he prevents it from bearing its fruit; his life is lost. Whoever, on the contrary, makes his life serve a good higher than itself, saves it in giving it. Moral precepts which to a superficial view appear arbitrary and seem made to spoil our zest for life have really but one object—to preserve us from the evil of having lived in vain. That is why they are constantly leading us back into the same paths; that is why they all have the same meaning: Do not waste your life; make it bear fruit; learn how to give it in order that it may not consume itself. Herein is summed up the experience of humanity, and this experience, which each man must remake for himself, is more precious in proportion as it costs more dear. Illumined by its light, he makes a moral advance more and more sure. Now he has his means of orientation, his internal norm to which he may lead everything back, and from the vacillating, confused and complex being that he was he becomes simple. By the ceaseless influence of this same law, which expands within him and is day by day verified in fact, his opinions and habits become transformed.

Once captivated by the beauty and sublimity of the true life, by what is sacred and pathetic in this strife of humanity for truth, justice and brotherly love, his heart holds the fascination of it. Gradually everything subordinates itself to this powerful and persistent charm. The necessary hierarchy of powers is organized within him; the essential commands, the secondary obeys, and order is born of simplicity. We may compare this organization of the interior life to that of an army. An army is strong by its discipline, and its discipline consists in respect of the inferior for the superior and the concentration of all its energies toward a single end. Discipline once relaxed, the army suffers. It will not do to let the corporal command the general. Examine carefully your life and the lives of others. Whenever something halts or jars and complications and disorder follow it is because the corporal has issued orders to the general. Where the natural law rules in the heart disorder vanishes.

I despair of ever describing simplicity in any worthy fashion. All the strength of the world and all its beauty, all true joy, everything that consoles, that feeds hope or throws a ray of light along our dark paths, everything that makes us see across our poor lives a splendid goal and a boundless future, comes to us from people of simplicity, those who have made another object of their desires than the passing satisfaction of selfishness and vanity and have understood that the art of living is to know how to give one's life.

CHAPTER III.

SIMPLICITY OF THOUGHT.

IT is not alone among the practical manifestations of our life that there is need of making a clearing; the domain of our ideas is in the same case. Anarchy reigns in human thought. We walk in the woods without compass or sun, lost among the brambles and briers of infinite detail.

When once man has recognized the fact that he has an aim, and that this aim is to be a man, he organizes his thought accordingly. Every mode of thinking or judging which does not make him better and stronger he rejects as dangerous.

And first of all he flees the too common contrariety of amusing himself with his thought. Thought is a tool, with its own proper function; it isn't a toy. Let us take an example. Here is the studio of a painter. The implements are all in place; everything indicates that this assemblage of means is arranged with view to an end. Throw the room open to apes. They will climb on the benches, swing from the cords, rig themselves in draperies, coif themselves with slippers, juggle with brushes, nibble the colors and pierce the canvases to see what is behind the paint. I don't question their enjoyment. Certainly they must find this kind of exercise extremely interesting. But an atelier is not made to let monkeys loose in. No more is thought a ground for acrobatic evolutions. A man worthy of the name thinks as he is, as his tastes are; he goes about it with his whole heart, and not with that fitful and sterile curiosity which, under pretext of observing and noting everything, runs the risk of never experiencing a deep and true emotion or accomplishing a right deed.

Another habit in urgent need of correction, ordinary attendant on conventional life, is the mania for examining and analyzing oneself at every turn. I do not invite men to neglect introspection and the examination of conscience. The endeavor to understand one's own mental attitudes and motives of conduct is an essential element of good living. But quite other is this extreme vigilance, this incessant observation of one's life and thoughts, this dissecting of oneself, like a piece of mechanism. It is a waste of time and goes wide of the mark. The man who, to prepare himself the better for walking, should begin by making a rigid anatomical examination of his means of locomotion would risk dislocating something before he had taken a step. You have what you need to walk with, then forward! Take care not to fall, and use your forces with discretion. Potterers and scruple mongers are soon reduced to inaction. It needs but a glimmer of common sense to perceive that man is not made to pass his life in a self centered trance.

And common sense—do you not find what is designated by this name becoming as rare as the common sense customs of other days? Common sense has become an old story. We must have something new, and we create a factitious existence, a refinement of living, that the vulgar crowd has not the wherewithal to procure. It is so agreeable to be distinguished! Instead of conducting ourselves like rational beings and using the means most obviously at our command we arrive, by dint of absolute genius, at the most astonishing singularities. Better off the track than on the main line! All the bodily defects and deformities that orthopedy treats give but a feeble idea of the humps, the tortuosities, the dislocations we have inflicted upon ourselves in order to depart from simple common sense, and at our own expense we learn that one does not deform himself with impunity. Novelty, after all, is ephemeral. Nothing endures but the eternal commonplace, and if one departs from that it is to run the most perilous risks. Happy he who is able to reclaim himself, who finds the way back to simplicity.

Good plain sense is not, as is often imagined, the innate possession of the first chance comer, a mean and paltry equipment that has cost nothing to any one. I would compare it to those old folk songs, unfathered, but deathless, which seem to have risen out of the very heart of the people. Good sense is a fund slowly and painfully accumulated by the labor of centuries. It is a jewel of the first water, whose value he alone understands who has lost it or who observes the lives of others who have lost it. For my part I think no price too great to pay for gaining it and keeping it for the possession of eyes that see and a judgment that discerns. One takes good care of his sword that it be not bent or rusted; with greater reason should he give heed to his thought.

But let this be well understood: An appeal to common sense is not an appeal to thought that grovels, to narrow positivism which denies everything it cannot see or touch; for to wish that man should be absorbed in material sensations, to the exclusion of the high realities of the inner life, is also a want of good sense. Here we touch upon a tender point, round which the greatest battles of humanity are waging. In truth, we are striving to attain a conception of life, searching it out amid countless obscurities and griefs, and everything that touches upon spiritual realities becomes day by day more painful. In the midst of the grave perplexities and transient disorders that accompany great crises of thought it seems more difficult than ever to escape with any simple principles. Yet necessity itself comes to our aid, as it has done for the men of all times. The programme of life is terribly simple after all, and in the fact that existence so imperiously forces herself upon us she gives us notice that she precedes any idea of her which we may make for ourselves and that no one can put off living pending an attempt to understand life. Our philosophies, our explanations, our beliefs, are everywhere confronted by facts, and these facts, prodigious, irrefutable, call us to order when we would deduce life from our reasonings and would wait to act until we have ended philosophizing. It is this happy necessity that prevents the world from stopping while man questions his route. Travelers of a day, we are carried along in a vast movement to which we are called upon to contribute, but which we have not foreseen nor embraced in its entirety nor penetrated as to its ultimate aims. Our part is to fill faithfully the role of private, which has devolved upon us, and our thought should adapt itself to the situation. Do not say that we live in more trying times than our ancestors, for things seen from afar are often seen imperfectly. It is, moreover, scarcely gracious to complain of not having been born in the days of one's grandfather.

What we may believe least contestable on the subject is this: From the beginning of the world it has been hard to see clearly; right thinking has been difficult everywhere and always. It the matter the ancients were in no wise privileged above the moderns, and it might be added that there is no difference between men when they are considered from this point of view Master and servant, teacher and learner, writer and artisan, discern truth at the same cost. The light that humanity acquires in advancing is no doubt of the greatest use, but it also multiplies the number and extent of human problems. The difficulty is never removed the mind always encounters its obstacle. The unknown controls us and hems us in on all sides. But just as one need not exhaust a spring to quench his thirst, so we need not know everything to live. Humanity lives and always has lived on certain elemental provisions.

We will try to point them out. First of all, humanity lives by confidence. In so doing it but reflects, commensurate with its conscious thought, that which is the hidden source of all beings. An imperturbable faith in the stability of the universe and its intelligent ordering sleeps in everything that exists The flowers, the trees, the beasts of the field, live in calm strength, in entire security. There is confidence in the falling rain, in dawning day, in the brook running to the sea. Everything that is seems to say: "I am, therefore I should be. There are good reasons for this, rest assured."

So, too, mankind lives by confidence From the simple fact that he is, man has within him the sufficient reason for his being—a pledge of assurance. He reposes in the power which has willed that he should be. To safeguard this confidence, to see that nothing disconcerts it, to cultivate it, render it more personal, more evident—toward this should tend the first effort of our thought. All that augments confidence within us is good, for from confidence is born the life without haste—tranquil energy, calm action, the love of life and its fruitful labor. Deep seated confidence is the mysterious spring that sets in motion the energy within us. It is our nutriment. By it man lives much more than by the bread he eats. And so everything that shakes this confidence is evil—poison, not food.

Dangerous is every system of thought that attacks the very fact of life, declaring it to be an evil. Life has been too often wrongly estimated in this century. What wonder that the tree withers when its roots are watered with corrosives. And there is an extremely simple reflection that might be made in the face of all this negation. You say life is an evil. Well, what remedy for it do you offer? Can you combat it, suppress it? I do not ask you to suppress your own life, to commit suicide—of what advantage would that be to us?—but to suppress

Suso, the great monk and mystic, one of the simplest and best men that ever lived, had a touching custom. Whenever he encountered a woman, were she the poorest and oldest, he stepped respectfully aside, though his bare feet must tread among thorns or in the gutter. "I do that," he said, "to render homage to our holy lady the Virgin Mary." Let us offer to hope a like reverence. If we meet it in the shape of a blade of wheat piercing the furrow, a bird brooding on its nest, a poor wounded beast, recovering itself, rising and continuing its way; a peasant plowing and sowing a field that has been ravaged by flood or hail, a nation slowly repairing its losses and healing its wounds—under whatever guise of humanity or suffering it appears to us, let us salute it. When we encounter it in legends, in untutored songs, in simple creeds, let us still salute it, for it is always the same, indestructible, the immortal daughter of God.

We do not dare hope enough. The men of our day have developed strange timidities. The apprehension that the sky will fall—that acme of absurdity among the fears of our Gallic forefathers—has entered our own hearts. Does the raindrop doubt the ocean, the ray mistrust the sun? Our senile wisdom has arrived at this prodigy. It resembles those testy old pedagogues whose chief office is to rail at the merry pranks or the youthful enthusiasms of their pupils. It is time to become little children once more, to learn again to stand with clasped hands and wide eyes before the mystery around us; to remember that, in spite of our knowledge, what we know is but a trifle, and that the world is greater than our mind, which is well, for, being so prodigious, it must hold in reserve untold resources, and we may allow it some credit without accusing ourselves of improvidence. Let us not treat it as creditors do an insolvent debtor; we should fire its courage, relight the sacred flame of hope. Since the sun still rises, since earth puts forth her blossoms anew, since the bird builds its nest and the mother smiles at her child, let us have the courage to be men and commit the rest to him who has numbered the stars. For my part I would I might find glowing words to say to whomsoever has lost heart in these times of disillusion: Rouse your courage; hope on. He is sure of being least deluded who has the daring to do that. The most ingenuous hope is nearer truth than the most rational despair.

Another source of light on the path of human life is goodness. I am not of those who believe in the natural perfection of man and teach that society corrupts him. On the contrary, of all forms of evil the one which most dismays me is heredity. But I sometimes ask myself how it is that this effete and deadly virus of low instincts, of vices inoculated in the blood, the whole assemblage of disabilities imposed upon us by the past—how all this has not got the better of us. It must be because of something else. This other thing is love.

Given the unknown brooding above our heads, our limited intelligence, the grievous and contradictory enigma of

SOME REASONS WHY PEOPLE ARE SETTLING IN MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA.

Because it is the best country known to the man of moderate means.
Because you will find a country of rich soil awaiting the settler.
Because there are uplands, prarieland, and alluvial river bottoms.
Because you can be certain of profitable returns from whatever you put into the soil.
Because the winter does not consume what the summer produces.
Because there are more and better opportunities for deversified farming than elsewhere.
Because the seasons are regular and no fear of crop failure.
Because the country is never scourged by cyclones and devastating storms and blizzards.
Because everything grown elsewhere can be produced here more abundantly.
Because truck farming is a success; products being early on the market obtain high prices.
Because no better fruit country is known, oranges, plums, peaches, pears, apples, grapes, strawberries, figs, pecans and other fully maturing.
Because there are more chances for profitable investment of capital than elsewhere in this country.
Because for healthfulness this section is unequalled on the face of the globe.
Because you have no long winter months to encounter, with no excessive dry heat in summer.
Because the climate is more uniform than elsewhere, no extremes of heat or cold.
Because you will find the as orderly communities as anywhere on this continent.
Because you will find the most open-hearted people on the globe.
Because education is paramount; public schools and churches of every denomination are to be found in all communities.
Because the railroad facilities of this section are unexcelled, a double tracked railroad traversing the entire length of both states.
Because really good lands are yet cheap.
Because the geographical location of these states gives them the best markets in the United States.

We secure land for home-seekers or for colonies. Write to-day for full particulars and letters from Northern farmers already located in the South.

Amelia E. Poling v. Isaac James Poling. No. 1319 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett county, Maryland.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree, divorcing the plaintiff, a vinculo matrimonii, from the defendant.

The bill states that the plaintiff and defendant were married in the year 1878 and that about ten years ago the defendant abandoned and deserted the plaintiff; that the conduct of the plaintiff towards her husband has always been kind and above reproach and that the defendant abandoned the plaintiff without just cause or reason and that such abandonment has continued uninterrupted for more than ten years and is deliberate and final and the separation of the parties beyond any reasonable expectation of reconciliation; that seven children have been born to said parties as a result of said marriage, the oldest of whom is thirty-one years of age and the youngest sixteen years of age; that the plaintiff desires to resume her maiden name, Amelia Elizabeth Shirley, and that the defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a decree divorcing the plaintiff and defendant a vinculo matrimonii; that the plaintiff be permitted to resume her maiden name and for general relief and an order of publication against the absent defendant.

It is thereupon, the 21st day of January, 1905, by the Circuit Court for Garret county, in Equity, ordered, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper, published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 4th day of March, 1905, give notice to the said absent defendant of the object and substance of this bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor on or before the 20th day of March next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" FENCES ARE WELDED BY ELECTRICITY.

This is the modern method of construction. Years of life are added through the elimination of serious fence defects.

A WRAP holds moisture, cracks the galvanizing and allows the water to attack the bare wire. A small amount of displaced galvanizing on "PITTSBURGH PERFECT" REINFORCES THE PROTECTION AGAINST RUST AT THE ELECTRICALLY WELDED JOINT; examine the joint.

STAYS CANNOT SLIP. They are always just where they were put. Stay and strand wires become one piece when the union is made. The fence is like a solid sheet of perforated steel.

Every Rod is Guaranteed Perfect.

Don't allow your prejudice in favor of the rapidly-declining and now antiquated methods you have heretofore known, to warp your good judgment.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" FENCES REPRESENT PROGRESS, because hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of standard material is daily welded by electricity.

The hoop on the average sugar barrel in the isolated country grocery store is an electrically welded product.

If your wagon was made in a large factory, its tires were welded by electricity.

You will find electrically welded hoops on ice cream freezers and washing machines, on many tubs and buckets. Examine them.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" fences are made by this modern, simple and marvelous process, producing "THE WELD THAT HELD."

MR. FARMER: LISTEN, NOW. Every agent handling "PITTSBURGH PERFECT" fences is authorized to guarantee this:

That the wires are not injured at the joints,
That the fence is perfectly adjustable to uneven ground.
That the stays will not separate from the strands.
That the fence is all right in every particular.

Could you ask any more definite protection? Your complete satisfaction is absolutely assured.

MARYLAND STATE LOTTERY LAW.

Publication in This Paper of Judge Keedy's Charge Creates Interest.

THE LAW AND ITS PENALTIES

Set Forth In Detail—Covers All Manner of Offenses Against Lottery Law—Second Offense Punishable by Confinement in Penitentiary.

The charge to the Grand Jury by His Honor Judge Keedy at Hagerstown concerning lotteries or "chancing off" of articles by lots which was published in these columns last week, has brought so many inquires to this office concerning the matter that we deem it expedient to publish a brief extract of the law bearing upon the subject so that all may become informed with both the law and its penalties.

Section 268, of Article 27, of the Code of Public General Laws of Maryland, provides that "no person shall draw any lottery or sell any lottery ticket in this State; nor shall any person sell what are called policies, certificates or anything by which the vendor or other person promises or guarantees that any particular number, character, ticket or certificate shall in any event or on the happening of any contingency entitle the purchaser or holder to receive any money, property or evidence of debt.

The preceding paragraph is the law in the case which has been very liberally construed by the courts.

Section 270 of the same Article prescribes the penalty in the following language: "Every person, his aiders and abettors, offending against any of the provisions of the preceding section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined for each offense any sum in the discretion of the Court not less than two hundred dollars nor exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisoned not less than three nor more than twelve months, or may be both fined and imprisoned as aforesaid."

Section 273 says: "The owner of any house or office who shall permit the same to be used as a place for selling lottery tickets, or any of the things in the nature thereof mentioned in the preceding section shall be liable to indictment, and upon conviction shall in the discretion of the Court be fined a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, or shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or shall be both fined and imprisoned; and any person who shall know that his house or office is used for such purpose shall be considered as permitting the same."

Section 275 prohibits the "printing, writing or in any other way publishing any account of any lottery, stating when or where the same is to be drawn, or the prizes therein, or the price of a ticket, or where any ticket may be obtained," under a penalty of a fine of $100 or imprisonment for the term of sixty days.

Section 277 renders void the transfer of any real estate, goods, chattels, or things in action, or any personal property secured through the agency of any lottery of chance.

Section 278, relating to a second offense against the law above quoted, provides for a penitentiary sentence of not less than two nor more than five years.

The above, we believe, covers all the points referred to in the communications received at this office concerning the lottery law and if observed by our correspondents they may save themselves from becoming involved in serious difficulties with the law.

TELEPHONE LINES BEING TAMPERED WITH

Leads Officials of the Company to Offer Reward for Offender.

Within the past week or two the lines of the Garrett County Telephone Company have been tampered with to such an extent that service on the through line was entirely knocked out and local lines disturbed so much that messages came through in jerks and jumps.

To correct this state of affairs and to apprehend the person responsible if possible President Maffett of the company went down Hooppole last Friday and at a point about six miles north of town located the trouble when he discovered that the local and through lines had been coupled together with a strap of wire. To reach the lines the person who committed the offense had climbed a tree and from the limbs he made the coupling.

While there is no clue to the offender other than suspicious circumstances surrounding the act, the officials of the company are making a thorough investigation and to help them solve the mystery a reward of $25 has been offered for information which will lead to the arrest and conviction of the party or parties committing the offense.

THE SCHOOL CHILDREN HONOR HIS MEMORY

Washington's Birthday Fittingly Observed in Schools Here by

RENDITION OF SPECIAL PROGRAM

Lincoln's, Longfellow's and Lowell's Birthdays Also Remembered Yesterday—Pupils in The Several Grades All Take Part in Program.

George Washington's Birthday was observed in the Oakland public schools yesterday when a specially prepared program which was rendered by scholars in the several grades. Lincoln's, Longfellow's and Lowell's birthdays also falling in February the anniversaries of the Martyred President and these two literary men were also observed in a striking manner.

The exercises in the first and second grades consisted of singing, recitations, etc., and were in charge of Misses Johnson and Browning the respective teachers of these branches. The program rendered was as follows:

Song, "America."

Sketch of Washington, by Clara Mitchell.

Recitation, Lois Fraley, Cecelia Hart and Lillian Helbig.

Song, "Maryland, my Maryland."

Sketch of Longfellow, Eleanor Hinebaugh.

Recitation, "The Village Blacksmith."

Children's Hour, Minnie Schultz.

Recitation, Annie McComas.

Flag Song.

Recitation, Kathleen Fraley.

Sketch of Lincoln, Franklin Kildow.

Recitation, Harry Naylor.

The Flag, Robert White.

Recitation, Alice Weber.

Snow Flakes, Evelyn Helbig.

Song, "Little Wee Wees."

In the third grade, Miss Dunham teacher, the program carried out was as follows:

Life of Washington, Miss Dunham.

Washington Exercises, seven boys.

Recitation, "Who Carried a Gun," Charles Wolf.

Hatchet Brigade, six girls.

Song, "Maryland, My Maryland."

February 22nd, Gilroy Whorton.

"A Brave Soldier," Procter Kildow.

Washington Our Model, Fred Moore.

Recitation, Madge Workman.

Quotations from Lowell.

Song, "Our Flag."

In the higher grades the program was much more elaborate and was participated in with much interest by the pupils. This department had as its guests Mr. Moses R. Hamill, president of the School Board, and Trustees Harned and Hart, all of whom made addresses to the assembled scholars who accorded the speakers their undivided attention.

The program in this department as rendered was as follows:

Song, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee."

Address, "The Possibilities of Every American Boy," Prof. J. Frank McBee, A. M., principal of the schools.

Address, "Washington," Edward H. Sincell, Jr.

Song, "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean."

France's Eulogy on Washington, Mary West.

Thomas Jefferson on Washington, Bessie Ault.

John Quincy Adams on Washington, Annie Mason.

William E. Gladstone on Washington, Cora Frantz.

Washington Irving on Washington, Ignatius White.

Lord Broughman on Washington, Eleanor Peddicord.

English View of Washington, Mamie Boyle.

Chauncey M. Depew on Washington, Rose Mitchell.

America on Washington, Anna Gonder.

Address on Washington, Fred Peddicord.

What I think of Washington, Fred. Fulmer.

Song, "Star Spangle Banner."

Essay on Lincoln, Edward Leary.

Early Impressions of Lincoln, Gus Newman.

Song, "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

Quotations from Lincoln's Letters, Mark White, Bernard Geissman, Dean Skinner, Henry Leuthke, Ella Cleveland and Bertie Lawton.

Speech on Lincoln, Pamelia Newman.

Song, "What Grandmother Says."

Essay on Longfellow, Nellie Workman.

Recitations, Clara Little, Fred Thayer, Lawrence Rice.

Dialogue on Longfellow.

Essay on Lowell, David Schultz.

Recitation, "The First Snowfall," Reta Fraley.

Impressions of Lowell, Agnes Greaser.

Song, "Old Oaken Bucket."

The exercises were in keeping with the day sought to be celebrated and brought before the children many facts in connection with the occasion that they would probably never learn otherwise, impressing upon their minds the very important points that require remembering.

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

Rev. E. B. Hatcher, D. D., of Baltimore, Superintendent of State Missions, will preach in the Union church of this place, at 11 o'clock a. m, Sunday, and Rev. A. L. Donarchy, of Friendsville, this county, will preach at 3 p. m. of same day. Rev. Board, of Pennsylvania, preaches at night. This with our popular stationed minister, Rev. W. H. Faust, and his coworker, Rev. Robt. A. Smith, of Barnesville, Md., as also Rev. F. M. Conway, of Friendsville, and Rev. N. Hart, of Mt. Lake Park, all of whom will be present at the services on Sabbath, gives to Deer Park an array of Baptist ministers such as has never been assembled at any one place in the county. Whilst we have not an over abundance of water we do have an over abundance of snow which can be utilized as a substitute.

We are sorry to note the serious illness of Mrs. Emanuel B. King, who lives but a short distance from this place, and her medical attendants have no hope of saving her life. We extend sympathy to her kind husband and family.

Mrs. E. F. Droege gave a delightful sled ride to a number of her friends of this place on Monday and spent part of the day visiting at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Felty, Jr., of your place, where an elegant dinner awaited them, and a cordial greeting from both host and hostess.

Mrs. L. D. Thrasher, accompanied by her niece Miss Nellye Hove, of Oakland, left Tuesday morning for Washington where they will spend a month visiting Mr. and Mrs. Hendrickson, their relatives, besides many other friends of that city and of course will witness the inaugural ceremonies on the 4th of March, and as the weather has moderated we know they will enjoy the many places of interest in the nation's capital.

We are glad to report the improved condition of Pauline Jones, the interesting little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Jones, who, as has been reported, was in a serious condition for the past six weeks, but under the skillful treatment of Doctor McComas, of your city, her devoted parents have every hope of her final recovery.

Rev. W. H. Faust, who closed a series of meetings at Elder Hill, where he accomplished much good, resumed the past week his meetings at this place and is ably assisted by one of his co-laborers in the state, Rev. R. A. Smith, a native of the great state of Texas, but now located at Barnesville, Montgomery county, Md. This young divine, like his state, is large, both physically and mentally and like his ministerial host from the equally great state of Georgia, whilst it can't eclipse the former in territory nor can he in physique, but with years he may prove the peer of his Texas giant.

We had a pleasant official call this morning from Mr. J. H. Lamberson, an efficient police officer of the B. & O. Railroad, who is looking after some petty larceny along the line of the Third division. Mr. Lamberson impressed the writer as a man not afflicted with the "swell head" as is so common with officers and petty officials of this company.

And now, Mr. Editor, I know you will pardon an ex-Confederate soldier as he glances at his calender and sees Feb. 21st, 1905, and then realizes that this, to him is a memorable anniversary of Feb. 21st, 1865, and I pause and think and can't realize that 40 years have glided into the past since that cold frosty morning when a little Spartan band of 64 men (pardon the word "Spartan" from one of the party) entered the city of Cumberland and captured Generals Crook and Kelly and Major Melvin, of General Kelly's staff. The city was guarded by 8500 infrantry and 2000 cavalry and then in later years learn that two prospective Presidents of this great country were also in this same city on that exciting night of forty years ago, one then called Col. Hayes, of an Ohio Regiment, the other a young major from same state known as Major William McKinley, of General Crook's staff. As your readers know Rutherford B. Hayes was elected President in 1876 and the lamented William McKinley was elected in 1896—twenty years between the two Presidents. In the interim one had been called to the great beyond and twenty five years later his great successor, the noble McKinley, like two of his predecessors (Lincoln and Garfield) was cut down in the zenith of his glory by the ruthless hands of an assassin. None regrets the untimely taking away of these great men more than the writer. As I take a retrospective view of the past forty years since that dashing ride of over one hundred miles and think of events before the final end of that struggle, thoughts flit and flash across my memory that would fill columns but not appropriate as a newspaper jotting.

With greetings to all your readers on this bright day after so many storms of winter, and longing for the springtime when we can hear the birds sing and see buds burst forth and nature put off this robe of white and put on a mantle of green, and see the roses bloom as of yore, and from every hill and from every valley in Garrett county, methinks I hear the echo: "Springtime comes, gentle Annie."

MORE ANON.

The Farmer and the Ad.

A farmer in speaking before an institute of his profession recently said: "As a rule the farmer knowns no firmer friend than the country press. The home paper is distinctly supported directly by the farmers who compose the backbone of the printer's subscription list and largely for what the enterprising merchant advertises. Now, brother, let us not forget our friends. Let us see that our subscription is paid before the first of January and a year in advance if we can afford it. The man or the paper that fights my battles shall have my support. Another thing: The merchants who advertise are the ones who make it possible for us to get a good local paper, and the men or firms who are too penurious to advertise and help support the local press have no right to the farmers' patronage. I propose hereafter to go to a good live advertiser and a man who will do his share in supporting the local press, thus contributing to my support, rather than buy of the man who proposes to take all and give nothing in return. If farmers as a class would support their friends, the other fellows would soon go out of business.

An Acknowledgment.

To the Editor of The Republican

I desire in this way this way to express my thanks to the good people of Crellin for the very generous donation of money, dry-goods, groceries, etc., amounting $18.12, they gave me. By me this was unexpected and undeserved. In return I can only give them my prayers and well wishes.

NEW FIRE EQUIPMENT PURCHASED BY COUNCIL.

Consisting of a Double Cylinder Chemical Engine for $650.

TO BE DELIVERED WITHIN 90 DAYS.

Water Works and Sewerage Franchise Asked by Mr. A. D. Naylor—Other Matters of Public Business Transacted.

A special meeting of the Town Council was held Monday night of this week, called for the purpose of purchasing additional fire equipment and for the transaction of any other public business that came to the attention of the body.

All members of the Council and Mayor McComas were prerent.

Messrs. Harned and Lawton, appointed at a previous meeting of Council to investigate the claims of various chemical engine manufacturers and to report at the special meeting, submitted a written report of their investigation and recommended the purchase of a four-wheel double cylinder engine, which recommendation was sanctioned by the Mayor, both members of the committee and Mayor McComas making speeches in support of their position, but upon a vote being taken it was decided to purchase a two-wheel double cylinder engine for $650, a bid having been submitted by the manufacturer covering such apparatus at the above price. A contract was entered into for the same for the delivery of the equipment within ninety days.

Mr. A. D. Naylor, through his counsel, Mr. E. H. Sincell, asked for a franchise covering the installation of a complete water works and sewerage system for the town, binding himself to have the same completed within one year from date of franchise under a forfeiture of bond amounting to $5,000. No definite action was taken by Council on the proposition at the time but favorable action is looked for at a future meeting.

Mr. G. S. Hamill appeared before Council with the statement that he had been called on to pay a bill of $50 for coats furnished during the Lutheran church fire, purchosed upon his order from Messrs. D. E. Offutt & Sons, for use of the volunteer firemen, requesting that he be reimbursed with one-half the amount from the funds of the corporation. The Council refused to accede to Mr. Hamill's demands, holding that to do so would be a misapplication of public funds.

An ordinance regulating the manner of constructing buildings within a certain portion of town, was read the first time.

An order was placed for apparatus to fully equip the present fire engine and hook and ladder truck, the same to be shipped at once.

No other matters being presented to Council it adjourned.

The Essence Of Good Cheer

By HOWARD FIELDING

Copyright, 1904, by Charles W. Hecke

IT may be said of Charlotte Ware and Albert Tyrrell that they lost each other in the darkness—the darkness of despondency. Seeing them together in the old days, one might have supposed that they were bound by an agreement to commit suicide instead of an engagement to marry. Charlotte was conducting the woman's page of a little, hopeless newspaper, and Tyrrell was practicing medicine, with mighty few patinents to practice it on. They used to lunch together in a gloomy restaurant opposite the hospital, with which Tyrrell had an unremunerative connection, and Charlotte would describe the impending bankruptcy of the newspaper, after which Tyrrell would tell about a patient who refused to recover or die or pay his bill.

So they went from bad to worse, and each was a millstone upon the other's neck, yet it is worth mentioning that neither was originally of a despondent disposition. They released each other from the engagement about once a week, but that never made the slightest difference.

Finally a man died in London and left Tyrrell a little money. There were legal complications, and it seemed advisable for him to go across the water to defend his rights. Of course he asked Charlotte to marry him, and she came very near accepting, but upon a practical consideration of the subject they discovered that they had not money enough between them to make the journey in good style and be safe against the chance of stranding in London in case the payment of the legacy should be deferred, as seemed quite likely. So Tyrrell crossed the ocean alone.

The legacy was involved in labyrinthine complications, but his lawyers were confident of ultimate success. They proved this confidence by advancing from time to time small sums which sufficed for a bare living, and Tyrrell stuck to the quest. By and by he began to practice medicine, and, though he gained some small repute, he made no pecuniary success. When his earnings were fair he invested the money in his own lawsuit; when they were meager he managed to live upon them.

Meanwhile, of course, he had released Charlotte from her engagement in the bluest letter that ever crossed the ocean. No old salt would have dared to sail with it if he had known that it was in the mail, for it was heavy with hard luck.

Releasing a girl from an engagement verbally across a bit of luncheon in a restaurant is a very different matter from releasing her by letter across the Atlantic. This may be especially true when the young man in question is very good looking and has expressive eyes, in which his love and tenderness may be easily read. That was the case with Tyrrell. When she could see him Charlotte pitied him too much to care what he said. But Tyrrell with a pen was another man. She had to sit down all alone with his letter and fight every word in it. She became angry with him, hopeless about him, finally a little contemptuous of his weakness. And so at last the correspondence ceased and the pretty promise they had made in one bright hour amid the long gloom was broken.

Tyrrell remained in England five years, and when he returned to America he did not know whether Charlotte was dead or alive, whether she had married or jilted the fellow who had been a rival at the outset of their acquaintance, whether she had preserved her prettiness or had faded early. She was nearing the calamitous age of thirty, that direful point upon the way of life where youth crashes down like a landslide and one looks back across a wilderness from which the dream flowers that never bloomed and the beautiful trees that bore no fruit have all been swept away.

To the questions above suggested Tyrrell knew not the answers. It would not be fair to say that he did not care, yet the truth is that his mind was upon another matter. He had just reached a settlement of his affairs in England, and his legacy had yielded him little more than enough to carry him home. True, it had provided him with a part of his living during five years, but who wants a living? What is it good for? Nine days in ten out of those five years Tyrrell would rather not have had a living; he would have preferred a dying.

He had come home by the malice of destiny, as he viewed it, to face precisely the same situation in this country. Again he was named in a will; again he must meet other claimants in the courts. The parties in each contest would be similarly situated. Indeed, some of the same people would appear.

Tyrrell had emerged from his previous struggle with certain convictions and nuggets of wisdom. He knew that his own claim in both cases was perfectly just, he knew that the disputants could be bought out cheaply if cash could be used immediately, but that after they got acrimonious from strife, and especially after their lawyers had gained ascendency over them, a settlement would cost more than it was worth.

He had only one near relative remaining on earth, a sister whose pecuniary interests were involved with his own in this new contest, as they had been in the other, but as she was married to a man of some means he had not worried much on her account. Upon arriving in his native land he learned immediately of the death of his sister's husband. This did not surprise him, for the last news that he had received in England had prepared him for the event. It appeared, however, that the husband's estate had vanished at his death, as so many others do, having been a pyramid kept balanced upon its apex by a constant, harrowing struggle and sinking instantly into oblivion when the sustaining force was withdrawn. In short, he found his sister dependent—or about to become so—upon the dubious issue of the legal battle which he himself had come home to fight.

His experience of the former contest filled him with cold fear, which was ten times intensified by the knowledge that a few thousands in cash would have set all right, and that he couldn't raise that sum, nor even 10 per cent of it, completed his panic.

Behold him on a balmy day in June shivering with nervousness as the result of an interview with his lawyer, whom he had visited in the gentleman's luxurious residence in a very fashionable suburb. Insensible to the colors of the blossoms and even to the heat of the sun upon his back, blind to the beauties of the town and deaf to the sound of his own name which some one was calling after him, he plodded on toward the station.

"Bert Tyrrell!" cried the voice for the fourth time and almost in his ear.

He turned and stared at two fine horses glittering in silver mounted harness and then at a liveried coachman and finally at a very charming woman in an open carriage.

"Lottie!" he said in a dazed tone. "Lottie!"

She surveyed him with an amused and quizzical smile.

"You haven't changed a bit," said she.

The words affected him with surprise, first, because he fancied himself grown old and haggard, and, second, because Charlotte herself was so radically different that the sight of her seemed to change all the world. Yet he could not have expressed his feeling; she looked no older; she had not gained flesh, as pretty girls are distressingly apt to do.

"Get in," she said. "We must have a good talk."

He smiled grimly.

"I was going to the station," he said, "but if you know of an old man's home or a nice, well managed asylum"—

"Now, that's the same Bert Tyrrell whom I used to know," said she, with a laugh. "I shall correct that habit in about five minutes. Get in."

As he climbed to a seat beside her laboriously, like a man of sixty, she gave the coachman the word "home." Then for the first time the elegance of the equipage and the simple magnificence of Charlotte's attire impressed themselves upon him. The blood fled away from his heart and tingled in his ears.

"Really," he stammered, "I—I have had no news. I don't know what to call you."

"Call me Lottie," she replied, "and please utter the word cheerfully. You're not altogether sorry to have met me, you know."

He made a melancholy effort to smile.

"Fairly good," said she, "but you can do better. Try again."

"You ask too much of me," he protested.

"Not at all!" she cried. "I fought that problem all out with myself nearly five years ago. One may always be cheerful."

He swept a slow, melancholy glance over the elegant interior of the carriage, which at that moment swerved from the road and passed through a stately arched gateway. A house was visible through the vistas of old trees.

"In such surroundings," said he sadly, "even I might smile."

"Your surroundings do not matter in the least," she retorted. "The smile must come from within."

"I remember that you used to write that sort of nonsense for your woman's page," said he, "but you never believed it."

"I believe it thoroughly today," she replied.

"Yes, yes," said he as the carriage stopped before the main entrance. "Yes, I've no doubt."

The broad veranda was liberally provided with comfortable chairs, into one of which Tyrrell sank with a sigh.

"Please pretend that you are comfortable and happy," said Charlotte, "and in a few minutes you will be."

Tyrrell scowled. He was trying to imagine the personal appearance of the multimillionaire whom Charlotte had married.

"You must remember," said he, "that I know nothing"—

"That's it," she interrupted. "You know nothing. Neither did I in the old days, but now I do, and I will teach you."

"Nothing of your story," he added.

"You shall hear it," said she. "Somewhat more than four years ago I became very despondent over—something that happened."

He groaned.

"It was better so," he said. "What could I have offered you"—

"With a sort of satirical joy," she continued, "I began to write more and more of that matter which you have just called nonsense."

"Cheerful living and that sort of thing?"

"Yes," said she; "sugar coated lying, as you used to call it. And presently, my friend, I discovered that it wasn't lying at all, it was the solid truth. And it made a great hit, Bert," she added. "It made a tremendous hit in the paper. You will believe that when I tell you that they raised my salary twice without my asking."

TYRRELL STEADIED HIMSELF AGAINST A PILLAR.

"Did you find out that the world was bright before or after those amazing occurrences?" he inquired.

"Well, really I've forgotten just when the true conviction came to me," she answered frankly, "but it must have been before I made any great success. One cannot write helpful words without sincerity."

"And you attained it?"

"Bert," she cried, "when I found out how much good I was doing, how many women—and men, too—I was helping to a braver, brighter, better life I knew that the truth must be in my own heart. Why, there were days when I received over 500 letters even before I left the paper."

"Before your—your marriage?"

"My marriage!" she exclaimed. "Why, bless the boy, I'm not married!"

Tyrrell surveyed the palatial front of the house with the eyes of a dreamer.

"Did somebody die?" he asked in a weak voice—"somebody who knew how to make a will, I mean?"

"But I made all this money myself. I started a magazine. Haven't you seen it? I sent you a copy. And I have a tremendous circulation in England."

He shook his head. She faced him with an enthusiasm that brought her to her feet.

"You've no idea of the good that I am doing," she cried. "Women from India, from Australia, actually from Greenland, have taken my letters of advice, in connection with the magazine, and have sent me words of thanks that have brought tears of joy to my eyes. I have a circulation exceeding 800,000."

He brushed the hair back from his forehead as he stared at her.

"But enough of my affairs for the present," she continued. "Of course I had to tell you how I was getting along. You knew nothing of me, but I knew all about you. I even knew that you were sunk in your old time despondency, and I resolved in the very deepest depths of my soul that I would cure you of it. I am going to give you some of my books to read"—

"And I'll read 'em, Lottie," he replied, "for your sake, though nothing in this world can ever make me cheerful. But I'll read the books when I'm not tangled with these beastly lawyers."

"You'll have no more trouble with them," said she. "I won't have my pupil's mind distracted by all that dreadful business."

"It can't be helped"—

"It has been helped. I have bought up all the other claimants through your legal friend, my neighbor. But he was not to tell you of it."

Tyrrell steadied himself against a pillar of the veranda.

"Lottie," he cried, "you shouldn't have done this! Why—why did you do it?"

"That you might pay attention to my instruction," said she. "I have helped those who were strangers to me, scattered over the world, and it will go hard if I cannot help my friend."

"Illogical woman!" he groaned. "Don't you see that you have blocked your own game? Your experiment must fail now."

"Fail?"

"Certainly. Your 'cheerful living,' or whatever you call it, can't do anything for me."

"Why not?" she gasped.

"Because I don't need it. If you could do this for me, even though I refuse it; if you could plan and work to make me happy—in short, if I am to you"—

"Just what you were in the old days, Bert."

"Then," he cried, his face radiant with his reawakened love, "where does your confounded faith cure get a chance upon a man so blessed?"

The Essence Of Good Cheer

By HOWARD FIELDING

Copyright, 1904, by Charles W. Hooke

IT may be said of Charlotte Ware and Albert Tyrrell that they lost each other in the darkness—the darkness of despondency. Seeing them together in the old days, one might have supposed that they were bound by an agreement to commit suicide instead of an engagement to marry. Charlotte was conducting the woman's page of a little, hopeless newspaper, and Tyrrell was practicing medicine, with mighty few patinents to practice it on. They used to lunch together in a gloomy restaurant opposite the hospital, with which Tyrrell had an unremunerative connection, and Charlotte would describe the impending bankruptcy of the newspaper, after which Tyrrell would tell about a patient who refused to recover or die or pay his bill.

So they went from bad to worse, and each was a millstone upon the other's neck, yet it is worth mentioning that neither was originally of a despondent disposition. They released each other from the engagement about once a week, but that never made the slightest difference.

Finally a man died in London and left Tyrrell a little money. There were legal complications, and it seemed advisable for him to go across the water to defend his rights. Of course he asked Charlotte to marry him, and she came very near accepting, but upon a practical consideration of the subject they discovered that they had not money enough between them to make the journey in good style and be safe against the chance of stranding in London in case the payment of the legacy should be deferred, as seemed quite likely. So Tyrrell crossed the ocean alone.

The legacy was involved in labyrinthine complications, but his lawyers were confident of ultimate success. They proved this confidence by advancing from time to time small sums which sufficed for a bare living, and Tyrrell stuck to the quest. By and by he began to practice medicine, and, though he gained some small repute, he made no pecuniary success. When his earnings were fair he invested the money in his own lawsuit; when they were meager he managed to live upon them.

Meanwhile, of course, he had released Charlotte from her engagement in the bluest letter that ever crossed the ocean. No old salt would have dared to sail with it if he had known that it was in the mail, for it was heavy with hard luck.

Releasing a girl from an engagement verbally across a bit of luncheon in a restaurant is a very different matter from releasing her by letter across the Atlantic. This may be especially true when the young man in question is very good looking and has expressive eyes, in which his love and tenderness may be easily read. That was the case with Tyrrell. When she could see him Charlotte pitied him too much to care what he said. But Tyrrell with a pen was another man. She had to sit down all alone with his letter and fight every word in it. She became angry with him, hopeless about him, finally a little contemptuous of his weakness. And so at last the correspondence ceased and the pretty promise they had made in one bright hour amid the long gloom was broken.

Tyrrell remained in England five years, and when he returned to America he did not know whether Charlotte was dead or alive, whether she had married or jilted the fellow who had been a rival at the outset of their acquaintance, whether she had preserved her prettiness or had faded early. She was nearing the calamitous age of thirty, that direful point upon the way of life where youth crashes down like a landslide and one looks back across a wilderness from which the dream flowers that never bloomed and the beautiful trees that bore no fruit have all been swept away.

To the questions above suggested Tyrrell knew not the answers. It would not be fair to say that he did not care, yet the truth is that his mind was upon another matter. He had just reached a settlement of his affairs in England, and his legacy had yielded him little more than enough to carry him home. True, it had provided him with a part of his living during five years, but who wants a living? What is it good for? Nine days in ten out of those five years Tyrrell would rather not have had a living; he would have preferred a dying.

He had come home by the malice of destiny, as he viewed it, to face precisely the same situation in this country. Again he was named in a will; again he must meet other claimants in the courts. The parties in each contest would be similarly situated. Indeed, some of the same people would appear.

Upon arriving in his native land he learned immediately of the death of his sister's husband. This did not surprise him, for the last news that he had received in England had prepared him for the event. It appeared, however, that the husband's estate had vanished at his death, as so many others do, having been a pyramid kept balanced upon its apex by a constant, harrowing struggle and sinking instantly into oblivion when the sustaining force was withdrawn. In short, he found his sister dependent—or about to become so—upon the dubious issue of the legal battle which he himself had come home to fight.

The Simple Life

By CHARLES WAGNER

Translated From the French by Mary Louise Hendee

Copyright, 1901, by McClure, Phillips & Co.

life, not merely human life, but life at its deep and hidden origin, all this upspringing of existence that pushes toward the light and, to your mind, is rushing to misfortune; I ask you to suppress the will to live that trembles through the immensities of space, to suppress, in short, the source of life. Can you do it? No. Then leave us in peace. Since no one can hold life in check is it not better to respect it and use it than to go about making other people disgusted with it? When one knows that certain food is dangerous to health he does not eat it, and when a certain fashion of thinking robs us of confidence, cheerfulness and strength we should reject that, certain not only that it is a nutriment noxious to the mind, but also that it is false. There is no truth for man but in thoughts that are human, and pessimism is inhuman. Besides, it wants as much in modesty as in logic. To permit oneself to count as evil this prodigious thing that we call life one needs have seen its very foundation, almost to have made it. What a strange attitude is that of certain great thinkers of our times! They act as if they had created the world very long ago, in their youth, but decidedly it was a mistake, and they had well repented it.

Let us nourish ourselves from other meat, strengthen our souls with cheering thoughts. What is truest for man is what best fortifies him.

If mankind lives by confidence, it lives also by hope—that form of confidence which turns toward the future. All life is a result and an aspiration; all that exists supposes an origin and tends toward an end. Life is progression; progression is aspiration. The progress of the future is an infinitude of hope. Hope is at the root of things and must be reflected in the heart of man; no hope, no life. The same power which brought us into being urges us to go up higher. What is the meaning of this persistent instinct which pushes us on? The true meaning is that something is to result from life, that out of it is being wrought a good greater than itself, toward which it slowly moves, and that this painful labor called man needs, like every worker, to count on the morrow. The history of humanity is the history of indomitable hope; otherwise everything would have been over long ago. To press forward under his burdens, to guide himself in the night, to retrieve his falls and his failures, to escape despair even in death, man has need of hoping always, and sometimes against all hope. Here is the cordial that sustains him. Had we only logic we should have long ago drawn the conclusion, Death has everywhere the last word, and we should be dead of the idea. But we have hope, and that is why we live and believe in life.

Suso, the great monk and mystic, one of the simplest and best men that ever lived, had a touching custom. Whenever he encountered a woman, were she the poorest and oldest, he stepped respectfully aside, though his bare feet must tread among thorns or in the gutter. "I do that," he said, "to render homage to our holy lady the Virgin Mary." Let us offer to hope a like reverence. If we meet it in the shape of a blade of wheat piercing the furrow, a bird brooding on its nest, a poor wounded beast, recovering itself, rising and continuing its way; a peasant plowing and sowing a field that has been ravaged by flood or hail, a nation slowly repairing its losses and healing its wounds—under whatever guise of humanity or suffering it appears to us, let us salute it. When we encounter it in legends, in untutored songs, in simple creeds, let us still salute it, for it is always the same, indestructible, the immortal daughter of God.

We do not dare hope enough. The men of our day have developed strange timidities. The apprehension that the sky will fall—that acme of absurdity among the fears of our Gallic forefathers—has entered our own hearts. Does the raindrop doubt the ocean, the ray mistrust the sun? Our senile wisdom has arrived at this prodigy. It resembles those testy old pedagogues whose chief office is to rail at the merry pranks or the youthful enthusiasms of their pupils. It is time to become little children once more, to learn again to stand with clasped hands and wide eyes before the mystery around us, to remember that, in spite of our knowledge, what we know is but a little, and that the world is greater than our mind, which is well, for, behold prodigious, it must hold in reserve untold resources, and we may well allow it some credit without accusing ourselves of improvidence. Let us not treat it as creditors do an insolvent debtor; we should fire its courage, relight the sacred flame of hope. Since the sun still rises, since earth puts forth her blossoms anew, since the bird builds its nest and the mother smiles at her child, let us have the courage to be men and commit the rest to him who has numbered the stars. For my part I would I might find glowing words to say to whomsoever has lost heart in these times of disillusion: Rouse your courage; hope on. He is sure of being least deluded who has the daring to do that. The most ingenuous hope is nearer truth than the most rational despair.

Another source of light on the path of human life is goodness. I am not of those who believe in the natural perfection of man and teach that society corrupts him. On the contrary, of all forms of evil the one which most dismays me is heredity. But I sometimes ask myself how it is that this effete and deadly virus of low instincts, of vices inoculated in the blood, the whole assemblage of disabilities imposed upon us by the past—how all this has not got the better of us. It must be because of something else. This other thing is love.

Given the unknown brooding above our heads, our limited intelligence, the grievous and contradictory enigma of human destiny, falsehood, hatred, corruption, suffering, death—what can we think, what do? To all these questions a sublime and mysterious voice has answered, Love your fellow men. Love must indeed be divine, like faith and hope, since she cannot die when so many powers are arrayed against her. She has to combat the natural ferocity of what may be called the beast in man. She has to meet ruse, force, self interest, above all, ingratitude. How is it that she passes pure and scathless in the midst of these dark enemies, like the prophet of the sacred legend among the roaring beasts? It is because her enemies are of the earth and love is from above. Horns, teeth, claws, eyes full of murderous fire, are powerless against the swift wing that soars toward the heights and eludes them. Thus love escapes the undertakings of her foes. She does even better—she has sometimes known the fine triumph of winning over her persecutors. She has seen the wild beasts grow calm, lie down at her feet, obey her law.

At the very heart of the Christian faith, the most sublime of its teachings, and to him who penetrates its deepest sense the most human, is this: To save lost humanity the invisible God came to dwell among us in the form of a man and willed to make himself known by this single sign—love.

Healing, consoling, tender to the unfortunate, even to the evil, love engenders light beneath her feet. She clarifies, she simplifies. She has chosen the humblest part—to bind up wounds, wipe away tears, relieve distress, soothe aching hearts, pardon, make peace. Yet it is of love that we have the greatest need. And as we meditate on the best way to render thought fruitful, simple, really conformable to our destiny, the method sums itself up in these words: Have confidence and hope; be kind.

I would not discourage lofty speculation, dissuade any one whomsoever from brooding over the problems of the unknown, over the vast abysses of science or philosophy; but we have always to come back from these far journeys to the point where we are, often to a place where we seem to stand marking time with no result. There are conditions of life and social complications in which the sage, the thinker and the ignorant are alike unable to see clearly. The present age has often brought us face to face with such situations. I am sure that he who meets them with our method will soon recognize its worth.

Since I have touched here upon religious ground, at least in a general way, some one may ask me to say in a few simple words what religion is the best, and I gladly express myself on this subject. But it might be better not to put the question in this form. All religions have of necessity certain fixed characteristics, and each has its inherent qualities or defects. Strictly speaking, then, they may be compared among themselves. But there are always involuntary partialities or foregone conclusions. It is better to put the question otherwise and ask, Is my own religion good, and how may I know it? To this question this answer: Your religion is good if it is vital and active, if it nourishes in you confidence, hope, love and a sentiment of the infinite value of existence; if it is allied with what is best in you against what is worst and holds forever before you the necessity of becoming a new man; if it makes you understand that pain is a deliverer; if it increases your respect for the conscience of others; if it renders forgiveness more easy, fortune less arrogant, duty more dear, the beyond less visionary. If it does these things it is good, little matter its name. However rudimentary it may be, when it fills this office it comes from the true source; it binds you to man and to God.

But does it perchance serve to make you think yourself better than others, quibble over texts, wear sour looks, domineer over others' consciences or give your own over to bondage, stifle your scruples, follow religious forms for fashion or gain, do good in the hope of escaping future punishment?—oh, then, if you proclaim yourself the follower of Buddha, Moses, Mohammed or even Christ, your religion is worthless; it separates you from God and man.

I have not perhaps the right to speak thus in my own name, but others have so spoken before me who are greater than I, and notably he who recounted to the questioning scribe the parable of the good Samaritan. I intrench myself behind his authority.

CHAPTER IV.

SIMPLICITY OF SPEECH.

SPEECH is the chief revelation of the mind, the first visible form that it takes. As the thought, so the speech. To better one's life in the way of simplicity one must set a watch on his lips and his pen. Let the word be as genuine as the thought, as artless, as valid. Think justly, speak frankly.

All social relations have their roots in mutual trust, and this trust is maintained by each man's sincerity. Once sincerity diminishes, confidence is weakened, society suffers, apprehension is born. This is true in the province of both natural and spiritual interests. With people whom we distrust it is as difficult to do business as to search for scientific truth, arrive at religious harmony or attain to justice. When one must first question words and intentions and start from the promise that everything said and written is meant to offer us illusion in place of truth, life becomes strangely complicated. This is the case today. There is so much craft, so much diplomacy, so much subtle legerdemain, that we all have no end of trouble to inform ourselves on the simplest subject and the one that most concerns us. Probably what I have just said would suffice to show my thought, and each one's experience might bring to its support an ample commentary with illustrations. But I am none the less moved to insist on this point and to strengthen my position with examples.

Formerly the means of communication between men were considerably restricted. It was natural to suppose that in perfecting and multiplying avenues of information a better understanding would be brought about. Nations would learn to love each other as they became acquainted; citizens of one country would feel themselves bound in closer brotherhood as more light was thrown on what concerned their common life. When printing was invented the cry arose, "Fiat lux!" and with better cause when the habit of reading and the taste for newspapers increased. Why should not men have reasoned thus: "Two lights illumine better than one, and many better than two. The more periodicals and books there are the better we shall know what happens, and those who wish to write history after us will be right fortunate. Their hands will be full of documents." Nothing could have seemed more evident.

Alas, this reasoning was based upon the nature and capacity of the instruments without taking into account the human element, always the most important factor! And what has really come about is this—that cavilers, calumniators and crooks, all gentlemen glib of tongue, who know better than any one else how to turn voice and pen to account, have taken the utmost advantage of these extended means for circulating thought, with the result that the men of our times have the greatest difficulty in the world to know the truth about their own age and their own affairs. For every newspaper that fosters good feeling and good understanding between nations by trying to rightly inform its neighbors and to study them without reservations, how many spread defamation and distrust! What unnatural and dangerous currents of opinion set in motion! What false alarms and malicious interpretations of words and facts! And in domestic affairs we are not much better informed than in foreign. As to commercial, industrial and agricultural interests, political parties and social tendencies or the personality of public men, it is alike difficult to obtain a disinterested opinion. The more newspapers one reads the less clearly he sees in these matters. There are days when after having read them all, and admitting that he takes them at their word, the reader finds himself obliged to draw this conclusion: Unquestionably nothing but corruption can be found any longer; no men of integrity except a few journalists. But the last part of the conclusion falls in its turn. It appears that the chroniclers devour each other. The reader has under his eyes a spectacle somewhat like the cartoon entitled "The Combat of the Serpents." After having gorged themselves with everything around them the reptiles fall upon each other, and there remain upon the field of battle two tails.

And not the common people alone feel this embarrassment, but the cultivated also; almost everybody shares it. In politics, finance, business, even in science, art, literature and religion, there is everywhere disguise, trickery, wire pulling—one truth for the public, another for the initiated. The result is that everybody is deceived. It is vain to be behind the scenes on one stage. A man cannot be there on them all, and the very people who deceive others with the most ability are in turn deceived when they need to count upon the sincerity of their neighbors.

The result of such practices is the degradation of human speech. It is degraded first in the eyes of those who manipulate it as a base instrument. No word is respected by sophists, casuists and quibblers, men who are moved only by a rage for gaining their point or who assume that their interests are alone worth considering. Their penalty is to be forced to judge others by the rule they follow themselves—say what profits and not what is true. They can no longer take any one seriously—a sad state of mind for those who write or teach! How lightly must one hold his readers and hearers to approach them in such an attitude! To him who has preserved enough honesty nothing is more repugnant than the careless irony of an acrobat of the tongue or pen who tries to dupe honest and ingenuous men. On one side openness, sincerity, the desire to be enlightened; on the other, chicanery making game of the public! But he knows not, the liar, how far he is misleading himself. The capital on which he lives is confidence, and nothing equals the confidence of the people unless it be their distrust when once they find themselves betrayed. They may follow for a time the exploiters of their artlessness, but then their friendly humor turns to hate. Doors which stood wide open offer an impassable front of wood, and ears once attentive are deaf. And the pity is that they have closed not to the evil alone, but to the good. This is the crime of those who distort and degrade speech: they shake confidence generally. We consider as a calamity the debasement of the currency, the lowering of interest, the abolition of credit. There is a misfortune greater than these—the loss of confidence, of that moral credit which honest people give one another, and which makes speech circulate like an authentic currency. Away with counterfeiters, speculators, rotten financiers, for they bring under suspicion even the coin of the realm. Away with the makers of counterfeit speech, for because of them there is no longer confidence in any one or anything, and what they say and write is not worth a continental.

You see how urgent it is that each should guard his lips, cleanse his pen and aspire to simplicity of speech. No more perversion of sense, circumlocution, reticence, lenigeration! These things serve only to complicate and bewilder. Be men. Speak the speech of honor. An hour of plain dealing does more for the salvation of the world than years of duplicity.

A word now about a national bias to those who have a veneration for diction and style. Assuredly there can be no quarrel with the taste for grace and elegance of speech. I am of opinion that one cannot say too well what he has to say. But it does not follow that the things best said and best written are most studied. Words should serve the fact and not substitute themselves for it and make it forgotten in its embellishment. The greatest things are those which gain the most by being said most simply, since thus they show themselves for what they are. You do not throw over them the veil, however transparent, of beautiful discourse, nor that shadow so fatal to truth called the writer's vanity. Nothing so strong, nothing so persuasive, as simplicity! There are sacred emotions, cruel griefs, splendid heroisms, passionate enthusiasms, that a look, a movement, a cry, interprets better than beautifully rounded periods. The most precious possessions of the heart of humanity manifest themselves most simply. To be convincing a thing must be true, and certain truths are more evident when they come in the speech of ingenuousness, even weakness, than when they fall from lips too well trained or are proclaimed with trumpets. And these rules are good for each of us in his everyday life. No one can imagine what profit would accrue to his moral life from the constant observation of this principle: Be sincere, moderate, simple in the expression of your feelings and opinions in private and public alike; never pass beyond bounds, give out faithfully what is within you, and above all watch—that is the main thing.

For the danger in fine words is that they live from a life of their own. They are servants of distinction that have kept their titles, but no longer perform their functions, of which royal courts offer us example. You speak well, write well, and all is said. How many people content themselves with speaking and believe that it exempts them from acting! And those who listen are content with having heard them. So it sometimes happens that a life may in the end be made up of a few well turned speeches, a few fine books and a few great plays. As for practicing what is so magisterially set forth—that is the last thing thought of. And if we pass from the world of talent to spheres which the mediocre exploit, there is a pellmell of confusion we see those who think that we are in the world to talk and hear others talk—the great and hopeless rout of babblers, of everything that prates, bawls and perorates and, after all, finds that there isn't talking enough. They all forget that those who make the least noise do the most work. An engine that expends all its steam in whistling has nothing left with which to turn wheels. Then let us cultivate silence. All that we can save in noise we gain in power.

SOME REASONS WHY PEOPLE ARE SETTLING IN MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA.

Because it is the best country known to the man of moderate means.
Because you will find a country of rich soil awaiting the settler.
Because there are uplands, prarieland, and alluvial river bottoms.
Because you can be certain of profitable returns from whatever you put into the soil.
Because the winter does not consume what the summer produces.
Because there are more and better opportunities for deversified farming than elsewhere.
Because the seasons are regular and no fear of crop failure.
Because the country is never scourged by cyclones and devastating storms and blizzards.
Because everything grown elsewhere can be produced here more abundantly.
Because truck farming is a success; products being early on the market obtain high prices.
Because no better fruit country is known, oranges, plums, peaches, pears, apples, grapes, strawberries, figs, pecans and other fully maturing.
Because there are more chances for profitable investment of capital than elsewhere in this country.
Because for healthfulness this section is unequalled on the face of the globe.
Because you have no long winter months to encounter, with no excessive dry heat in summer.
Because the climate is more uniform than elsewhere, no extremes of heat or cold.
Because you will find the as orderly communities as anywhere on this continent.
Because you will find the most open-hearted people on the globe.
Because education is paramount; public schools and churches of every denomination are to be found in all communities.
Because the railroad facilities of this section are unexcelled, a double tracked railroad traversing the entire length of both states.
Because really good lands are yet cheap.
Because the geographical location of these states gives them the best markets in the United States.

We secure land for home-seekers or for colonies. Write to-day for full particulars and letters from Northern farmers already located in the South.

STATE AID FOR ROADS.

The Court of Appeals having declared in a decision announced February 9th that the Shoemaker Road Law is constitutional, nothing now stands in the way of the State and the counties working shoulder to shoulder to obtain that greatest of all boons to rural communities—good roads. The Highway Division of the Maryland Geological Survey has everything prepared and, in some cases, surveys made so that there can be no delay in starting in on the work if the county commissioners only do their share and apply promptly and before March 1st, 1905.

The attractiveness of the law as a business proposition is so self-evident as to need no elaboration. The examples of Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York and Connecticut furnish data and living examples of the good that must inevitably follow improved roads. Progressive communities invariably have good roads or are attaining that end rapidly as commensurate with good financial management, and conversely, good roads invariably indicate progressive communities. No matter how attractive a county or section may be otherwise, the wide-awake man in locating shuns bad roads. It is the first thing that appeals to or repeals visitors, and one of the things that fixes lasting impressions for good or bad are the roads of a state. Therefore Maryland, to be classed with her progressive neighbors to the north, must take hold of this improvement with vim. Formerly the lame expense of good roads stood in the way—now this is halved and there is no reason why every county should not make a start to raise itself to meet the demands of present day progress, and apply for at least some of its money, enough to build a mile or two of these roads which will last years after the present patch system has repaired again and again.

The county commissioners of this county have not shown their progressive spirit by applying for State aid. It should be borne in mind that for the county to receive benefit it is necessary for the county commissioners to sign the formal petition and send it to the Highway Division of the Maryland Geological Survey before March 1st.

The construction of these roads is to be under the immediate supervision of the Highway Division of the Maryland Geological survey, of which Dr. Wm. Bullock Clark is the superintendent and A. N. Johnson Highway Engineer. The law requires that detailed plans and surveys and estimates of the cost of the work shall be made before the building of the road is undertaken. The amount of money allotted by law to each county is in accordance with the road mileage of the respective counties. Garrett is entitled to receive $12,000 providing the county commissioners petition for State aid before the first of March.

If the administrative offices propose to anything along this line the time has arrived for action.

BIG MINING SMALL VEIN

The Cumberland-George's Creek Company's Operations Near Westernport.

One of the early and extensive operations in the small vein is the Cumberland and George's Creek Coal Company, which recently acquired 500 acres in Allegany and Garrett counties. The company is now operating in the four-foot vein and has a dump between the Franklin and Phoenix mines. Shipments are made daily and the output is gradually increasing. The property is also underlaid with a six foot vein, which has been made inaccessible owing to slips in the mountain. However, the company expects to overcome all difficulties and will soon be mining the larger vein.

BLOOMINGTON.

Rev. J. W. Williams, of St. James Episcopal Church Westernport, was in town on Thursday, visiting members of his congregation living in this vicinity.

The report that a man had been killed in the B. & O. cut at the East end of the stone bridge, raised considerable excitement in town on last Saturday evening.

Later on it was found to be a case of plain drink, with wobbly legs and a desire to snooze between the tracks.

The engineer of 2246 going East when he noted the sleeping form between the tracks, supposed he was dead and reported the case at Piedmont. A watchman was sent back to investigate and when he arrived at the place designated, the man was gone and could not be found.

Mr. W. A. Brydon, who has been quite sick and confined to his room for the past three weeks is still very ill.

Mr. Smouse principal of our school and his assistant Miss Plenant Howard were both indisposed on Monday and Tuesday of this week and compelled to close the school. Teaching was resumed on Wednesday morning

On account of scarcity of cars work at the different mines in this vicinity has been slack during the past week.

Mr. Henry Barrow, of Chestnut Grove, and a well known republican of District No. 4, has been confined to the house for the past two weeks suffering from a severe attack of grip.

Mr. John Miller has purchased all the stock and fixtures of the late Mr. Goetz, of Luke. Mr. Miller expects to add to and replenish the stock and will continue the business at the old stand. He took possession of his new purchase on last Monday morning.

Mr. John Rowland, of Piedmont, was in town with relatives on Wednesday.

Rev Father Heath, assistant priest to Father Gallogher, of St. Peter's Parish, Westernport, spent Thursday in town with members of his congregation.

Mrs. Granville Evans, of Piedmont. was in town on Wednesday.

Miss Lotta Kemp entertained a number of her friends at dinner on last Saturday evening in honor of her birthday.

The new M. E. church will be opened on March 19th, 1905. Rev. Snedegar and the members of his congregation are preparing for an extra big day.

MR. A. F. GEORGE IN OHIO.

The Cambridge (O.) Daily Sun, of the 17th inst., says concerning Mr. A. F. George, of Swanton who is one of the rural agents of the Postoffice Department:

"Mr. A. F. George special inspector of the postoffice department for the rural delivery service is in the city for the purpose of perfecting a county system.

"He is preparing a complete map locating every highway and rural route in the county. Mr. George is one of the most efficient inspectors in the service. He has had charge for the most part of the rural routes now in operation in this county, and is familiar with the highways and byways over which new routes may be established. It may be in the readjustment necessary to perfect the system a few may not get as good service as they now have, but many others will be accomodated who now have no service at all. It is to be hoped that every family in the county will be accommodated with rural free delivery."

Prosecutor Stirs Morgantown.

Prosecuting Attorney C. W. Cramer has written letters to four physicians of Morgantown calling their attention to the fact that they had been issuing an extraordinary large number of prescriptions for whiskey, alcohol, wine and other intoxicants. Some of these prescriptions were without dates, without names, without quantity specific and without the kind of booze named. The Prosecutor warns them that there may be cause for prosecution if the practice contiuues. Mr. Cramer visited all the drug stores in the city and looked over the prescriptions on file.

TAXABLE BASIS OF MARYLAND.

Reports Show An Increase Since Last Year.—Garrett's Basis Over $7,000,000.

ANNAPOLIS, MD., Feb. 21.—Official figures of the total assessed value of taxable property in the different counties of Maryland and Baltimore city show that there has been a slight increase in the amount in the state since last year, and that there has also been some increase in Baltimore city, notwithstanding the fire. The total in the state reaches $680,743,794, against $678,337,299 last year, and the total for Baltimore city is $386,362,772, against $385,348,528 last year.

The amount raised by the state tax is much in excess of previous years, owing to the fact that the rate is now 22½ cents on the $100.

The increased rate is due to the fixing of the school tax at 15 cents, instead of 10½, and the levying of the tax of one cent on the $100 on the public building loan of 1904. The amount which will be raised this year by the state is $1,531,673.54; that last year was $1,144,673.40.

The assessed value of the property in Allegany county is $18, 013, 661 and in Garrett $7,416,143.

Notice.

The undersigned having purchased the stock of goods and all book accounts belonging to Chas. S. May at Swanton, notice is hereby given to all parties owing said May to make settlement at once at the store above mentioned.

The business will be continued at the old stand by a competent manager where all patrons will be fairly dealt with and a full stock of seasonable and merchantable goods kept constantly on hand.

All kinds of good produce will be taken in exchange for goods.

Thhaking you for past favors and soliciting a continuance of the same, I am,

Very respectfully,

MINERAL SPRINGS.

Not seeing any items in your valuable paper from this place for quite a time, we are glad to note a few that we think would be of interest to its readers.

On account of the zero weather the people of this place and vicinity find it very difficult to do much hauling, the roads being full of drifted snow. At this writing the weather is much more calm. The snow has ceased to drift, and the sun has found its way out as it did on ground hog day.

We are glad to note that there has been but little sickness prevailing so far this winter. Let us wish for a continuance of the same.

The school of this place has been progressing nicely under the able management of Mr. L. K. Fike, teacher, with an enrolement of 24 pupils, and an average of 20

Mr. Geo. Oester, of this place, sold his farm to Conrad, his brother. He then bought the Dehl farm on Bowser Ridge, to which place he has already taken his family. His children are missed by both teacher and pupils.

Mr. Conrad Oester is now occupying his newly purchased residence of this place.

Mr. Peter Reichenbaker lost a valuable horse one day last week.

In spite of the zero weather Mr. C. Speicher and his eldest son Harry, took a flying trip to Salisbury, Pa., the 15th inst., returning the following day.

Mr. Kerlin, teacher at Keyser, started off last Saturday morning on foot to Grantsville, a distance of 6 miles. Let us hope that he enjoyed his long walk through the deep snow, and that he had a welcome from his best girl.

Mr. John Hanft calls often of late at the Reichelt mansion.

Miss Emma Kamp, of Cove, was a guest of Miss Cora Hanft a few days last week, during which time both the young ladies visited the school at this place.

Mr. John Hanft says he enjoys living in his new house just fine this cold weather.

Mr. R. R. Speicher has been somewhat under the weather on account of a bad cold, although at this writing he is much better.

Mr. John Hanft, Malin George and others took a flying trip to the Dutch mill and back Saturday last. They report a real good time wading snow and say it is some places in the woods forty-two inches deep.

Mr. Wm. Lakel, of Keyser, received a message from Addison calling him to the bedside of his daughter, who is very ill at this time.

BUILDING COMMITTEE APPOINTED

To Formulate Plans and Secure Ways and Means for New Lutheran Church Edifice.

A number of the members of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church met at the Garrett Memorial church in Oakland on Tuesday night to discuss ways and means and formulate plans for the rebuilding of the edifice which was recently burned.

Among other business transacted a building committee consisting of Rev E. Manges, chairman ex-officio, Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh, Lloyd Lantz and James A. Sincell, representing the official board, and Messrs. Moses R. Hamill and Benj. H Sincell, representing the congregation, was elected and given the necessary authority to communicate with and secure plans and arrange ways and means for the re-erection of the building.

The church, plans for which have not yet been decided upon, will be a neat one and will be substantially built.

A meeting of the committee will be held on Saturday afternoon when some definite arrangements will be completed.

BITTINGER.

This week begins with rain and some indications of a break in the long continued winter.

Mr. Clarence Brenneman has opened a saddler and repair shop in the Engle building opposite the postoffice, and is prepared to do all kinds of repair work in harness and shoes. All will do well to patronize this new industry.

Messrs. A. J. Oester and Samuel J. Brenneman were on a business trip to Grantsville last Monday.

Dr. Beavans, of Grantsville, was called to this place last Sunday to attend Mrs. Oliver Beachy, who is reported quite ill.

Mr. Joel Orendorf is numbered among the ailing this week.

Messrs. Simon and Asa Orendorf, with their sister Miss Lizzie, drove over to Pennsylvania last week to visit their sister Mrs. Maust.

Messrs. Young Lohr and Leonard Shaw, of Jennings, were seen sleighing about town last Sunday evening.

Miss Agnes Bittinger, one of our obliging central telephone girls, is spending a few days at the home of Mr. William Brenneman on Meadow Mountain.

Mr. and Mrs. Jonas Bittinger and their daughter Mrs. Chas. Sechler, were on a shopping expedition to Accident last Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wiley made a business trip to Oakland last week.

Mr. Silas Beachy and family were calling upon Mr. and Mrs. Ellithorp Monday afternoon.

Consumption

¶ There is no specific for consumption. Fresh air, exercise, nourishing food and Scott's Emulsion will come pretty near curing it, if there is anything to build on. Millions of people throughout the world are living and in good health on one lung.

¶ From time immemorial the doctors prescribed cod liver oil for consumption. Of course the patient could not take it in its old form, hence it did very little good. They can take and tolerate it for a long time. There is no oil, not excepting butter, so easily digested and absorbed by the system as cod liver oil in the form of Scott's Emulsion, and that is the reason it is so helpful in consumption where its use must be continuous.

¶ We will send you a sample free.

¶ Be sure that this picture in the form of a label is on the wrapper of every bottle of Emulsion you buy.

STATE SCHOOL REPORT.

Issued By Superintendent M. Bates Stephens.

The report of the Department of Public Education, by State School Superintendent M. Bates Stephens, for the fiscal and scholastic year ended July 31, 1904, has just been issued. In addition to full statistical information, the work contains a number of special articles on education, and cuts showing a group picture of the State Board of Education, its new quarters in the old Treasury Building at Annapolis, the Frostburg Normal School the Oakland school and some other new school buildings throughout the State.

It is accompanied by the report of the State Board of Education for the fiscal and school years ended in the city of Baltimore on December 31, 1902, and in the counties on July 31, 1903; the proceedings of the Maryland State Teachers' Association at Ocean City last July, and the Institute Manual for the school year 1904 1905.

A Monument to Williams.

The bill recently introduced in the Senate by Senator McComas appropriating $20,000 for a statue to Gen. Otho Polland Williams, of Williamsport, Md., has been favorably reported by the Committee on Library. In the report, written by Senator Wetmore, the committee expresses its conviction that 105 years after the death of General Williams, the friend of Washington and of Nathaniel Greene, the nation may safely expend $20,000 in erecting this modest memorial to his memory.

Mr. Jonas D. Brenneman, of Grantsville, accompanied by Mr. Fred. Gortner, of Gortner, were busines visitors to this office Tuesday morning. Mr. Brenneman started on his return home the same afternoon, overland, and the way was no doubt strenuous, owing to the sudden thaw.

Mrs. M. D. H. Taylor, of the Ladies Bazaar, advertises in this paper today a great reduction in prices on staple goods preparatory to removing her stock from the Democrat building to one of the rooms in the Ravenscroft building on Second street.

Mr. Charles S. May, of Swanton, who has been conducting a general store and grist mill at that point for a number of years, sold his holdings on Friday last to Mr. P. T. Garthright, of Mountain Lake Park, who has taken charge of same, and in this paper gives notice to all to settle up who are indebted to Mr. May.

Piedmont is stirred from end to end by one of the greatest religious revivals ever experienced in that section of the state. Since the opening of special services at St. John's Southern Methodist church on New Year's day interest has steadily increased, until now the entire population of the place seems to have become a part and parcel of the religious movement. Even the saloon keepers contemplate closing their places until the revival ends.

Mr. George Loar, of the firm of Loars, Jewelers, who has been at his home in Oakland for some weeks past, suffering with an attack of the grip, is, we are pleased to note, now improving, and expects to be able to return to his duties in this city within a week or so. George is greatly missed here, and everybody will be glad to see him back.—Grafton Sentinel.

The rooms recently added to the Ravenscroft building are nearing completion and will in all probability be occupied next week by the following tenants: Chas. Liller, barber shop; Andrew Gonder, books, cigars, periodicals, candy, etc. The Ladies' Bazaar will occupy the room vacated by Mr. Gonder and Mr. J. N. Robinson will move into the room now occupied by Mr. Liller, thus leaving the lower floor of the Democrat building tenantless.

Tuesday was the fortieth anniversary of the capture of Generals Crook and Kelly at Cumberland, which was participated in by a number of Garrett countians, among them being Mr. William Hoye, of Deer Park, Mr. Jas. TRUE AMERICANISM.

Lecture on This Subject Will be Delivered by Rev. Edward Thompson.

Rev. Edward Thompson, D. D., LL.D., the lawyer-preacher of Chicago, Ill., will deliver a lecture entitled, "True Americanism," in St. Paul's M. E. church on Tuesday night of next week. The admission will be free and will be given in the interests of the Sunday League of America and under the auspices of the three Protestant denominations of Oakland, namely: Methodist, Lutheran and Presbyterian.

Of the speaker the following testimonials have been furnished us for publication:

Samuel Schwarm, D. D., First Lutheran church, Wheeling, West Va.: "I heard him several times. He is not an extremist. He takes a basis upon which all our Christian Churches can unite. He is a pleasing speaker and will accomplish good in any community. I hope he may be permitted to do much throughout our Mountain State."

Rev. Wm. M. Hudson, Ph D., First Presbyterian Church, Clarksburg, W. Va.: "Our people were very much interested in his work here. There is great need of men of his ability in such work."

Rev. John Beddow, Andrews M. E. Church, Grafton, W. Va.: "I heard three of his addresses. They were strong and forcible. I know of no man more able to stir an audience and bring conviction that the Lord's day ought to be kept sacred than Dr. Thomson."

We sincerely hope that all our people will hear this noted speaker.

Church Services.

[We ask that ministers and others who desire announcements made in this column to furnish copy not later than Wednesday noon of each week, so that the same may be classified.]

BAPTIST.

Rev. R. A. Smith, pastor of a Baptist church at Barnesville, Montgomery county, Maryland, preached at Deer Park last Sunday morning to a very large congregation. The pastor, Rev. W. H. Faust, announced that the collection would be devoted to the Church Extension Society. His efforts to lay the foundation for a new Baptist church at Deer Park have been successful in so far as arousing interest. He will hold meetings in Deer Park every night this week and on next Sunday morning Rev. Dr. Hatcher, a noted Baptist clergyman from Baltimore city, will preach.

CATHOLIC.

Rev. James E. Connell, pastor of St. Peter's Catholic church, sends the following note: "Will you kindly announce through THE REPUBLICAN that the repairs to the boiler in St. Peter's church have been completed and therefore the usual services will be held on Sunday next at 8 and 10.30 o'clock a. m."

LUTHERAN.

Services will be held by St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran congregation in the Garrett Memorial church next Sabbath as follows: Sunday school at 8.30 a. m. Preaching in the Deer Park Lutheran church at 11 o'clock a. m.

FRIENDSVILLE CIRCUIT.

Rev. Henry E. Friend, of Hoyes, will preach on Sunday at Hoyes at 10.30 o'clock a. m.; at Elder Hill 3 p. m, and at Friendsville at 6.45 in the evening, in the absence of the pastor who will spend the day at Grantsville.

The Second Quarterly Conference will be held by Presiding Elder Ward in the Selbysport church at 2.30 on Saturday, March 4th to be followed on Sunday by continuous service with preaching by Dr. Ward.

W. M. Lister, Pastor.

Judge Criticizes Governor.

Judge Keedy, who presided at the murder trial of Charles Barton, whose death sentence has been commuted to life imprisonment by Governor Warfield, openly criticises the Executive's action. Judge Keedy contends that the sentence of death should have been executed, and he thinks his opinion should have been sought before clemency was granted. State's Attorney A. J. Long is very much incensed over the appearance of the life of Charles Barton, a book containing a large picture of Mr. Long. Mr. Long has issued a warning to the publishers against further distribution of the books. The publishers are continuing the distribution after having pasted blank sheets over Mr. Long's picture.

The protracted meeting which began in St. Paul's M. E. church on Monday of last week is becoming quite interesting with increased numbers present every night and delightful music. The merchants of town acceded to the request of Rev. Workman, of the church, who asked that they close their stores at 7.15 each evening, for which he as well as the members of his church are grateful.

GOOSE BONE SCIENCE

Weather Indicator Of A Talbot County Philosopher.

Mr. M. L. Wroten has hanging up in his office in Easton, Talbot county, Md., the breast bone of a goose, by which he says he can tell the kind of weather that will happen in less than 14 hours. He can look at the bone at 5 o'clock in the afternoon and tell whether it will rain, hail, snow or be clear the next morning. He says that when rain or snow is coming the bone will become moist or dark in color; when the weather is going to be clear the bone is perfectly dry and white, and when a drop in the thermometer is impending it will turn purple. It is necessary, he says, to have a new goose bone every year. He has watched the different flocks of geese and always procured the weather goose for the past 35 years, and has never known it to fail to accurately indicate the character of the weather.

In every flock of wild or domesticated geese, according to this authority, there is one goose which always takes the lead, and the others follow him wherever he goes. Upon this goose there is a peculiar mark which does not appear on any other goose in the flock, and this goose is known as the "weather goose."

In the early part of the winter his goose bone indicated that there would be 29 snows this winter. Twenty-two have already occurred. He says there is a secret in knowing what bone to pick out of the "weather goose" as a weather indicator, but he refused to tell the secret. He has been offered $15 for his bone, but refused to take it, saying he would not sell it for $100.

Many people visit his office daily to find out what weather will prevail the next day. He predicted the recent blizzard and day by day he gets true prognostications. He has no use for the Weather Bureau.

FIRE AT MIDLAND.

This Morning Destroys Opera House, Dwelling and Five Saloons.

Fire which broke out in the opera house at Midland, located midway between Lonaconing and Frostburg, this morning at four o'clock destroyed the opera house, barber shop and dwelling of John Paul and five saloons before it could be checked.

The water pipes in the town were all frozen up rendering the town without fire protection of any character.

No statement of the probable loss has yet been made.

The Martha Washington Tea held last night in Offutt's Hall for the benefit of the Presbyterian church, by the ladies of that congregation, was well patronized and was a success. The ladies, costumed in dresses stylish many years ago, with their hair powdered, lent an air of Colonial times to the occasion.

Marriage Licenses Granted in Cumberland.

In Cumberland on Tuesday of this week licenses to marry were granted unto the following:

Robert Jasper Reel and Bertie McGinnis, of Bayard, W. Va.

Alvin August Garlitz and Esther Louisa Weimer, both of Avilton, Garrett county.

Lent is Foreshadowed.

Sunday was Septuagesmia Sunday and from now until the end of Lent the "Gloria" will not be heard in the mass, and the adornments in the Catholic churches and the vestments of the clergy will assume a more sober hue. It is the foreshadowing of Lent which, however, does not begin for several weeks.

Children Neglected.

Because the father failed to provide proper care and support Martha H., May and Porter L. Lewis, children of Sidney A. Lewis, of near Swallow Falls, were brought before Justice Gonder last Saturday under the provisions of the law of 1900, Chapter 306, the complaint having been lodged against the father by one of his neighbors. The Justice determined the matter after hearing the evidence and adjudged that the children had been sadly neglected by their father and released in the hands of Bruce Lewis, an uncle, who adopted them under an agreement with their father.

The children were aged nine, seven and four years. Their mother died a year or two ago. With their uncle they will find a comfortable home and will receive the proper attention.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mr. P. T. Garthright is spending several days at Swanton, looking after business interests at that place.

The revival meetingt at the U. B. church are growing in interest and results.

Dr. R. B. Ward preached a very interesting and profitable sermon in the M. E. church of this place last Sabbath evening.

Mr. Fred Clair and Mr. J. B. Rothruck, who have been on the sick list, are up and able to be about the house.

Mr. John Martin and wife, of near the Park, are enroute to the northern part of Texas. Mr. M. will locate either in Texas or Oklahoma.

Miss Mayme Carr, daughter of Mr. L. P. Carr, was tendered a china shower last Tuesday evening, at her home, Fairmont, W. Va., preceding her marriage to Mr. J. Burt Martin, of Pittsburg, which event took place Wednesday evening at 6 o'clock. The wedding took place at the home of the bride and the ceremony was performed by Rev. G. D. Smith, of the M. E. church. The newly married couple will reside in Pittsburg, where Mr. Martin holds a good position in the Walkover shoe establishment. Mrs. Martin with her parents has been a summer citizen of the Park for the past eighteen years.

Rev. Mr. Metheney preaches at this place Sabbath 7:30 p. m., and at Wesley chapel at 10:30 a. m.

Miss Sadie Laughlin is visiting friends at Piedmont, W. Va.

Mr. Wiley Weiling who has been working at Grafton, spent the Sabbath at this place with his family.

The Miracle Of The Loaves And Fishes

Crucial times had come. John Baptist was martyred. Prudence suggested retirement. Weariness demanded it. The retreat would also afford the apostles an opportunity to report more minutely to the Master the experiences of their trial-trip, two and two, through Galilee, from which they had just returned. So the boat which had been chartered for Jesus and "waited upon Him" was employed to put the weary toilers beyond the reach of the multitudes that pressed upon them even at mealtimes.

Headwinds probably drove the little bark near shore and retarded its progress. Clandestine as the departure had been it failed of its purpose. An ever-augmenting throng hurried around the head of the lake, and probably apprised some pilgrim caravans to the Passover of the coming of the great Nazarene. So when Jesus' boat ran its keel upon the pebbly shore, there stood five thousand men, not to mention the women and children.

So far from being irritated by the failing of His plans, Jesus' heart was touched to pity at sight of the shepherdless flock, and He began at once to instruct them in many phases of the doctrine of grace. In the absorbing interest of the theme neither Teacher nor taught observed how the sun was dipping to the western horizon.

But the commissary of the apostolic college suddenly awoke to the situation. Five regiments, and no stores on hand or any country to forage upon! After some questions on Jesus' part, calculated to test His disciples' faith, but to which they responded with phenomenal obtuseness, He proposes to work what, in some respects, was His most remarkable and significant miracle.

The material basis of the miracle was paltry in the extreme,

But one poor fisher's rude and scanty store
Is all He asks (and more than needs),
Who men and angels daily feeds.

There is a vivid, descriptive touch in the Greek which does not appear in our version. Under Jesus' direction the confused throng was resolved into the order of a French parterre. He had them sit platwise, so that they looked, in their high-colored garments, like veritable flower-beds with green turf intervening.

After the cheerful grace, which Jesus never omits, He puts a morsel of bread and fish in the hand of each apostle, and sends him forth to serve. What each breaks off is larger far than what remains. But that which remains is undiminished. And all are fed and filled. As a lesson in frugality, the unused fragments are ordered to be gathered up. Each hesitating apostle holds in his hands the tangible evidence of the reality and magnitude of the miracle wrought.

Even a casual reader of the Bible will hardly fail to note that St. John has a philosophy of his own, in accordance with which he arranges the facts, miracles, and discourses of Jesus. He does not do violence to chronology, but he is not hampered by it. His purpose is to show the evolution of Jesus' character and work in the most effective way possible. The material is vast and bewildering. In fine hyperbole John exclaims that if all the things that Jesus said and did were recorded the world would not contain the books that would be written. Selection is necessary. To this end he makes choice of scenic incidents and the sermons which they evoked. So follow in order the first and second miracles at Cana, the conversations of Jesus with the woman and Nicodemus, the miracle of healing at Bethesda, and of feeding beside the sea. Nothing could be more spirited! There is a philosophic continuity which is far more effective than a bald chronological one could possibly be.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Lovely evidence is here of the implicit confidence which maintained between Jesus and His apostles. They came to Him. They told Him what they had done, what they had taught. They were sure of His sympathy. If they needed correction, they knew it would be done in love.

The eldest disciples have no monopoly, however, of Jesus' sympathy. He is touched with a feeling for us, too. We can come to Him also, to "tell Jesus" is still the disciples' blissful recourse.

The same considerateness which Jesus showed for the health and comfort of His toilers, He still feels for those who in this latter day are engaged in His service. Seasons of respite are indispensable for the highest effectiveness. A Church imitates the Master when it gives an industrious pastor a vacation. It says, "Go apart, and rest awhile."

But apostles nor preachers have a monopoly of Jesus' sympathy. It sweeps out to inclose all sorts and conditions of men. Jesus was as compassionate toward the five thousand as toward the twelve. So His heart goes out toward the great unchurched masses to-day.

This boy went into partnership with Jesus. His little store was not taken from him by force. The moment he heard the Master had need he came running, and explaining, "Lord, if you can use these, you are welcome to them!" With a boy's lunch Jesus fed five thousand. Young people have talents the Master can employ to-day. General Booth says, "Shake the napkin at every corner!" The hidden "pounds" will be sure to roll out.

Five crackers and two dried herring—talk of feeding five thousand with them! But add to the crackers and fish the almightiness of Jesus, and the proposition ceases to be ridiculous. The resources of the Church for spiritual sustenance for the thousand millions of earth are palpably inadequate, until the Savior's power and blessing is added the equation. Then there is enough and to spare.

The heavenliness of this miracle is evident in its orderliness. There was no unseemly scramble, inequality, or waste. All was precision, method, order.

Mosaic from Commentaries.

The Sea of Galilee: Sweet water, full of fish, a surface of sparkling blue, tempting down breezes from above, bringing forth breezes of her own, the Lake of Galilee is at once food, drink, and air, a rest to the eye, coolness in the heat, an escape from a crowd, and a facility of travel very welcome in so exhausting a climate. —George Adam Smith. When Jesus then lifted up His: Better as in the American Revision, "Jesus therefore lifting up His eyes." Saw a great company come ["seeing that a great multitude cometh"]: Not the same crowd mentioned in verse 2, else in the Greek the article would have inserted, but a Passover caravan coming from some other direction.—Dods. Saith unto Philip: Why to Philip? Not because he happened at that moment to be nearest to Jesus (Alford); nor as Bengel suggests, because he had charge of the commissariat; but Cyril is right who finds the explanation in the character of Philip, and in the word to prove him.—Expositor's Greek Testament. This was not a trail of Philip's faith, but a test whether he could suggest any expedient; and the answer of the disciple (verse 7) conveys also the impression that he knew of none.—Meyer. What He would do: Without suggestions from others. It was not bread He sought from Philip, but faith.—Augustine. Philip's home was Bethsaida. He was therefore acquainted with the region and people.—Peloubet. Jesus takes it for granted that they must all dine with Him.—Henry. This is the only action in Jesus' life recorded by all the evangelists.—Ibid. Make the men sit down: This was like sending Providence to market.—Ibid. Philip answered: A matter-of-fact man, quick reasoner, good man of business, more ready to rely on his own shrewd calculations than on unseen resources. This weakness Jesus gives him the opportunity of conquering.—Dods. Two hundred pennyworth—$32. It was equivalent to his asking, "Can He furnish a table in the wilderness?"—Henry. A lad, four loaves, two fishes: When Count Zinzendorf was a boy at school he founded amongst his school fellows a little guild which he called the "Order of the Grain of Mustard-seed," and thereafter that seeding grew into the great tree of the Moravian Brotherhood, whose boughs were a blessing to the world. —Farrar. Make the men ["people"] sit down: An order indicative of our Lord's design that there might be no confusion and that the attention of all might be directed to what He was about to do.—Butler. It invited close inspection. Given (1) that there might be no unseemly crowding round Him and crushing out the weaker: and (2) that they might understand they were to have a full meal, not a mere bite they could take in their hand in passing. Obedience to this request tested the faith of the crowd. —Dods. Observe the furniture of the dining-room, there was much grass there; served as cushions for those who sat upon the ground.—Henry. Jesus took the loaves: The distribution was with thanksgiving and universal satisfaction.—Ibid. Fragments: The grant we have of God's good creatures is large and full, but with the proviso, willful waste only excepted.—Ibid. This was for these Orientals a most important lesson in thrift. The poor are proverbially thriftless everywhere; but nothing could exceed the lavish wastefulness of the poor Orientals when a moment of good fortune has filled his hands with plenty. He absolutely takes no thought for the morrow, and, if reminded of the coming day, will calmly reply, "The Lord will provide."—Ewing. This has been noticed as a strong mark of truth, most unlikely to have been invented by the writer of a fiction. For it is improbable, from a human point of view that one who could multiply food at will should give directions about saving fragments.—Cambridge Bible.

DR. SPEICHER SURPRISED.

He Rounds Up His Fiftieth Birthday in Los Angeles.

A very pleasant surprise was given Dr. A. F. Speicher of 3005 Vermont Ave., Los Angeles, Cal., on January 10, 1905, the occasion being the fiftieth anniversary of his birth. The Doctor could hardly realize his position when asked to enter the parlor and meet his friends. It was an enjoyable occasion and a very pleasant evening was spent in games, conversation, music and refreshments. They all wished that the Doctor might have a return of fifty more occasions similar to this one. Those present were Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Livengood, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Benford, Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Harper, Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Bauer, Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Runkle, Misses Ada Bailey, Cora Harper, Grace Haivley and Dr. E. H. McMillen.—Meyersdale Commercial.

Letter to R. E. Sliger. Oakland.

Dear Sir: A big mill-owner, Spartansburg, S C, wanted 5,000 gallons of paint, and bought by price; paid 5 cents less than ours; got a "lead and zinc" paint; but the lead was sulphate of lead; not carbonate. Sulphate costs about half; and covers about half.

That paint was adulterated about six times as much as the 5 cents paid for. He "saved" 5 cents and it cost him 30.

Oh no; it cost him more than that; we forgot the labor. Can't work it out exactly; don't know how long it'll wear.

Short measure besides; that alone was twice as much as his "saving" 5 cents.

It was thin, too; some loss there; don't know how much.

There was too much dryer in it. The maker made something on that; he didn't.

Taking it altogether, he didn't make much by that 5 cents.

Go by the name; and the name is Devoe lead-and-zinc.

Yours truly

MAJOR J. M. BURNS.

The following concerning a gentleman well known in Oakland, appeared in the Morgantown Post of last week.

MORGANTOWN, Feb. 11, 1905.

To the Editor of The Post.

I have recently received a circular in regard to the medals of honor awarded by the War Department to officers and men of the Army. It seems there were 1704 medals awarded for gallantry, thirty-one of which were to men from West Virginia, Major J. M. Burns, U. S. A., is I think, the only one now living. It appears from this record that Major Burns was given this medal for gallantry at the battle of New Market, Virginia, May 15th, 1864. The ground for the award as officially given is as follows:

"Under a heavy fire of musketry, he rallied a few men to the support of the colors, in danger of capture, and bore them to a place of safety. One of his comrades having been severely wounded in the effort, Sergeant Burns went back a hundred yards, in the face of the enemy's fire, and carried the wounded man from the field."

I think many of the friends of Major Burns are not acquainted with these facts, and therefore I have sent them to you for publication.

Captain Henry L. Hawthorne, of the Artillery also received a medal for distinguished conduct in battle with hostile Indians at Wounded Knee Creek, South Dakota, December 29th, 1890. Captain Hawthorne has many relatives living in this county and in Preston county.

Very respectfully,
R. M. G. BROWN.

STORY OF "THE OLD GUM TREE"

Along the Sharpsburg and Boonsboro Turnpike.

SOME UNWRITTEN WAR HISTORY.

Reminder of Interesting Events of Years Ago From the Pen of Mr. J. A. Miller, of Keedsville, Who at That Time Was 6 Years Old.

The old gum tree that stands alongside the Boonsboro and Sharpsburg Turnpike, about two hundred yards west of Antietam Creek, yet remains a monument of a bit of war history that has never been written, and to a few a reminder of interesting events long ago, by many forgotten.

It was a hot summer day like when Maud Muller "raked the meadows sweet with hay," but the visions that danced in Maud's tender and innocent mind had no place in the minds of either young or old among the residents of this part of Washington county on that memorable day in August, 1864, when the gleam of the glistening bayonet and keen-edged saber flashed from hill top to mountain side, and the clatter of horses' hoofs resounded along the dusty highway with here and there squads of cavalry dashing through clouds of dust, sometimes through fields of tasseled corn, pasture lands or ploughed fields, ever keeping a watchful eye on the movements of the Johnnies whose superior forces had again invaded "My Maryland" on one of the raids so notable that year for driving away our cattle and taking all the horses they could find.

The Confederate forces were variously estimated at twelve thousand to fifteen thousand men, mostly infantry, and having charge of a wagon train. "Our men," as the "Boys in Blue," were familiarly known and named among us, numbered four hundred or less and were a portion of Colonel Cole's cavalry, noted for their courage and daring exploits in the face of the enemy. Under the command of Col. George W. F. Vernon (now a resident of Baltimore), a detachment of cavalry crossed South Mountain by the National Turnpike and charged the Confederates who were in the immediate vicinity of Boonsboro, driving them toward the Potomac river. It was the purpose of Colonel Cole to protect the citizens and property in Antietam Valley, and if possible to capture a part of the Confederate wagon train and take it across South Mountain.

As the sun was fast approaching the zenith of its glory that day, David Kretzer, who enlisted March 17th, 1864, in Company H. P. H. B. cavalry, left his home in Keedysville, where he spent a few hours with his family, and cautiously, but hurridly, made his way toward the little village of Porterstown to join his comrades. Finding them in the deep ravine between Porterstown and Antietam Creek, he ascended the hill to the south on which was located a brick house and large red barn, owned and occupied by John Ecker. From this elevation he had a full view of the entire field of operations. He at once hastened to join his company and came to the turnpike about two hundred yards east of the bridge, where a comrade was concentrating his muscular power on the trunk of a large gum tree, endeavoring to chop it down and throw it across the road and check the advance of the Confederate forces.

The axe being very dull, slow progress was made on the tough and wiry gum which stood the storms of many years and was now almost a match for the sturdy and brave soldier, who now and then heard the creeping "whiz" of the Minie balls from a sharpshooter on the hill a half mile westward. Comrade Kretzer took his turn at trying to fell the old gum tree, but the "whistling whiz" became much more frequent, proving that the advance line of the enemy was getting nearer. The situation was becoming critical and rather than take further risks they decided to abandon any further attempt to get the tree across the pike. To this day the old tree still holds its place and the marks made by the axe almost forty-one years ago, although grown over by the gnarly gum, is plainly seen on both sides of the trunk.

The Confederates kept on advancing, at the same time throwing a detachment across the creek at Burnside's Bridge, made an attempt to flank Colonel Vernon's men by reaching the road leading from Porterstown across the mountain to Rohrersville, at the same time the main column engaging the attention of the Union forces by desultory firing from the hill just west of the bridge. This movement was observed by Benjamin F. Miller from the upper story of the Ecker farm house. He at once hastened down a small ravine, unobserved by the Johnnies, to the turnpike, and informed Colonel Vernon, who doubted his statement, he being a stranger to the colonel. The Federal forces little dreamed of the size of the army they were fighting, and kept on firing at the enemy with the determination to check the advance and if possible to drive them across the Potomac river. Mr. Miller repeated what he told Colonel Vernon and added, "If you don't get your men out of this place in a few minutes, your escape will be impossible." For a verification of his statement, Mr. Miller appealed to several of Colonel Vernon's men whom he had known six or eight year, among them being Eli D. Valentine (now deceased), who vouched for every word Mr. Miller had told the colonel. "Retreat" was the order, and in an instant the entire cavalry force was in the saddle, and dashing through Porterstown made their escape to the mountain by the Rohrersville road, but not until they turned the Confederate flank movement at the edge of the timber after a sharp skirmish. One thing that caused Colonel Vernon to be resting easy was the fact that Company G was holding the bridge on which that company had dragged a large flat boat taken from the creek.

The Confederates, seeing their chances for the capture of Colonel Cole's men about gone, followed in hot pursuit, but refused to go beyond the outskirts of the mountain timber. It was indeed a close call, only a matter of a few minutes and retreat would have been completely cut off. One of the Confederate officers remarked afterward that their plans failed because they mistook the by-road or lane leading from the main road to the Thomas farm house for the mountain road, and did not hurry up their men enough to hold it.

Just over the mountain at the place now known as Mt. Briar lay several Pennsylvania regiments that never crowned themselves with patriotic glory. Had they taken the lower road to Sharpsburg via Burnside's Bridge, they could have given the Confeds a lot of trouble and no doubt have driven them out of Maryland in a few hours, and thus saved a lot of stock and other property for our farmers.

Many have been the changes since that memorable day. The writer, then a little boy less than six years of age, recalls a few of the incidents of that raid. The generation that then lived has passed away, and with two or possible three exceptions, no one is now living within a mile of the gum tree or bridge who witnessed the exciting scenes at that time. The tree still remains, but in a shaggy decaying condition, and may soon have to give way to the march of modern improvements that is, if the new trolley line goes that way. The bridge collapsed nearly fourteen years ago and went to the bottom of the stream. A new iron bridge took its place and now spans the creek. The mill near by that turned out two thousand to three thousand barrels of flour per-year, much of which went by the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to Georgetown, ceased its work fifteen years or more ago and during the summer of 1904 was razed to the ground. Here is an invaluable water power awaiting some great enterprise when the right man with capital sees it.—J. A. Miller in the Hagerstown Herald and Torch-Light.

VALUABLE HELP TO REPUBLICANS.

Found In the Proposed Disfranchisement Amendment.

"The Republican party would prefer that the Court of Appeals reverse the decision of the lower court and sustain Governor Warfield in the disfranchising amendment to the Constitution," said Chairman John B. Hanna, of the Republican State Central Committee, yesterday, "but if the decision of the higher court should affirm that of the Circuit, we shall be prepared to accept the result and to plunge at once into the campaign to defeat the amendment. And a very warm campaign it will be—one of the warmest, in fact, ever witnessed in this state.

"It may be possible, with the amendment as an issue, that the Republican party will be a beneficiary. By that I mean that the unpopularity of the amendment will be so great that our candidates will be elected in a majority of the counties and in Baltimore city. I am sure that the amendment will play a most important part in the municipal campaign in Baltimore, and will prove to be a large aid to the Baltimore candidates, though I have no wish to inject politics into that campaign. People opposed to the amendment will express their opposition when they cast their votes at the May election, and there is no power to prevent such opposition.

"The Republicans will be favored in their campaign by the drastic features of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, should the validity of that amendment be upheld by the Court of Appeals. If the amendment were less drastic, and if it met the Democratic promises in the last state campaign, it would command the support of the whole Democratic party and possibly the support of a few Republicans, but when the people of this state, irrespective of party, consider that the power of registration is placed in haphazard boards of registry, and that certain foreigners and descendants of foreigners will be excluded from registration, under the 'grandfather's clause,' they will pause and reflect, and will realize what enormous power they are taking from themselves and placing into the hands of others to be used as a whip to lash them in the future.

"President Roosevelt's speech in New York last night, in which he dealt with the race problem in a masterly way, should bring to the people of Maryland the important lesson as to what shall become of the colored race, if we are to exclude them from the rights of suffrage simply because of their color. I wish every man in Maryland would read the President's speech and study its meaning carefully.

"The Republican State Central Committee is proceeding on the theory that the opinion of the Court of Appeals be favorable to the validity of the amendment without the Governor's signature. We have already done much work designed to defeat the amendment, and just as soon as the decision of the court is made known we shall be prepared to proceed with the campaign, not along defensive, but along aggressive lines.

The retreat would also afford the apostles an opportunity to report more minutely to the Master the experiences of their trial-trip, two and two, through Galilee, from which they had just returned. So the boat which had been chartered for Jesus and "waited upon Him" was employed to put the weary toilers beyond the reach of the multitudes that pressed upon them even at mealtimes.

Headwinds probably drove the little bark near shore and retarded its progress. Clandestine as the departure had been it failed of its purpose. An ever-augmenting throng hurried around the head of the lake, and probably apprised some pilgrim caravans to the Passover of the coming of the great Nazarene. So when Jesus' boat ran its keel upon the pebbly shore, there stood five thousand men, not to mention the women and children.

So far from being irritated by the failing of His plans, Jesus' heart was touched to pity at sight of the shepherdless flock, and He began at once to instruct them in many phases of the doctrine of grace. In the absorbing interest of the theme neither Teacher nor taught observed how the sun was dipping to the western horizon.

But the commissary of the apostolic college suddenly awoke to the situation. Five regiments, and no stores on hand or any country to forage upon! After some questions on Jesus' part, calculated to test His disciples' faith, but to which they responded with phenomenal obtuseness, He proposes to work what, in some respects, was His most remarkable and significant miracle.

The material basis of the miracle was paltry in the extreme,

> But one poor fisher's rude and scanty store
> Is all He asks (and more than needs),
> Who men and angels daily feeds.

There is a vivid, descriptive touch in the Greek which does not appear in our version. Under Jesus' direction the confused throng was resolved into the order of a French parterre. He had them sit platwise, so that they looked, in their high-colored garments, like veritable flower-beds with green turf intervening.

After the cheerful grace, which Jesus never omits, He puts a morsel of bread and fish in the hand of each apostle, and sends him forth to serve. What each breaks off is larger far than what remains. But that which remains is undiminished. And all are fed and filled. As a lesson in frugality, the unused fragments are ordered to be gathered up. Each hesitating apostle holds in his hands the tangible evidence of the reality and magnitude of the miracle wrought.

Even a casual reader of the Bible will hardly fail to note that St. John has a philosophy of his own, in accordance with which he arranges the facts, miracles, and discourses of Jesus. He does not do violence to chronology, but he is not hampered by it. His purpose is to show the evolution of Jesus' character and work in the most effective way possible. The material is vast and bewildering. In fine hyperbole John exclaims that if all the things that Jesus said and did were recorded the world would not contain the books that would be written. Selection is neeessary. To this end he makes choice of scenic incidents and the sermons which they evoked. So follow in order the first and second miracles at Cana, the conversations of Jesus with the woman and Nicodemus, the miracle of healing at Bethesda, and of feeding beside the sea. Nothing could be more spirited! There is a philosophic continuity which is far more effective than a bald chronological one could possibly be.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Lovely evidence is here of the implicit confidence which maintained between Jesus and His apostles. They came to Him. They told Him what they had done, what they had taught. They were sure of His sympathy. If they needed correction, they knew it would be done in love.

The eldest disciples have no monopoly, however, of Jesus' sympathy. He is touched with a feeling for us, too. We can come to Him also, to "tell Jesus" is still the disciples' blissful recourse.

The same considerateness which Jesus showed for the health and comfort of His toilers, He still feels for those who in this latter day are engaged in His service. Seasons of respite are indispensable for the highest effectiveness. A Church imitates the Master when it gives an industrious pastor a vacation. It says, "Go apart, and rest awhile."

But apostles nor preachers have a monopoly of Jesus' sympathy. It sweeps out to inclose all sorts and conditions of men. Jesus was as compassionate toward the five thousand as toward the twelve. So His heart goes out toward the great unchurched masses to-day.

This boy went into partnership with Jesus. His little store was not taken from him by force. The moment he heard the Master had need he came running, and explaining, "Lord, if you can use these, you are welcome to them!" With a boy's lunch Jesus fed five thousand. Young people have talents the Master can employ to-day. General Booth says, "Shake the napkin at every corner!" The hidden "pounds" will be sure to roll out.

Five crackers and two dried herring—talk of feeding five thousand with them! But add to the crackers and fish the almightiness of Jesus, and the proposition ceases to be ridiculous. The resources of the Church for spiritual sustenance for the thousand millions of earth are palpably inadequate, until the Savior's power and blessing is added the equation. Then there is enough and to spare.

The heavenliness of this miracle is evident in its orderliness. There was no unseemly scramble, inequality, or waste. All was precision, method, order.

DR. SPEICHER SURPRISED.

He Rounds Up His Fiftieth Birthday in Los Angeles.

A very pleasant surprise was given Dr. A. F. Speicher of 3005 Vermont Ave., Los Angeles, Cal., on January 10, 1905, the occasion being the fiftieth anniversary of his birth. The Doctor could hardly realize his position when asked to enter the parlor and meet his friends. It was an enjoyable occasion and a very pleasant evening was spent in games, conversation, music and refreshments. They all wished that the Doctor might have a return of fifty more occasions similar to this one. Those present were Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Livengood, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Benford, Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Harper, Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Bauer, Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Runkle, Misses Ada Bailey, Cora Harper, Grace Haivley and Dr. E. H. McMillen.—Meyersdale Commercial.

Letter to R. E. Sliger. Oakland.

Dear Sir: A big mill-owner, Spartansburg, S C, wanted 5,000 gallons of paint, and bought by price; paid 5 cents less than ours; got a "lead and zine" paint; but the lead was sulphate of lead; not carbonate. Sulphate costs about half; and covers about half.

That paint was adulterated about six times as much as the 5 cents paid for. He "saved" 5 cents and it cost him 30.

Oh no; it cost him more than that; we forgot the labor. Can't work it out exactly; don't know how long it'll wear.

Short-measure besides; that alone was twice as much as his "saving" 5 cents.

It was thin, too; some loss there; don't know how much.

There was too much dryer in it. The maker made something on that; he didn't.

Taking it altogether, he didn't make much by that 5 cents.

Go by the name: and the name is Devoe lead-and-zinc.

Yours truly

P. S. J. M. Davis & Sons, sell our paint.

MAJOR J. M. BURNS.

The following concerning a gentleman well known in Oakland, appeared in the Morgantown Post of last week.

MORGANTOWN, Feb. 11, 1905.
To the Editor of The Post.

I have recently received a circular in regard to the medals of honor awarded by the War Department to officers and men of the Army. It seems there were 1704 medals awarded for gallantry, thirty-one of which were to men from West Virginia, Major J. M. Burns, U. S. A., is I think, the only one now living. It appears from this record that Major Burns was given this medal for gallantry at the battle of New Market, Virginia, May 15th, 1864. The ground for the award as officially given is as follows:

"Under a heavy fire of musketry, he rallied a few men to the support of the colors, in danger of capture, and bore them to a place of safety. One of his comrades having been severely wounded in the effort, Sergeant Burns went back a hundred yards, in the face of the enemy's fire, and carried the wounded man from the field."

I think many of the friends of Major Burns are not acquainted with these facts, and therefore I have sent them to you for publication.

Captain Henry L. Hawthorne, of the Artillery also received a medal for distinguished conduct in battle with hostile Indians at Wounded Knee Creek, South Dakota, December 29th, 1890. Captain Hawthorne has many relatives living in this county and in Preston county.

Very respectfully,
R. M. G. BROWN.

For Sale—Tread Power.

Can use one, two or three horses, suitable for grinding corn on cob, sawing wood, shredding fodder, chopping hay or straw—in fact anything power may be attached to. The machine is almost new, in thorough repair and will be sold at a bargain. Farm work requiring use of horses operating it and the installation of a gas engine to take its place is our reason for offering it for sale.

STORY OF "THE OLD GUM TREE"

Along the Sharpsburg and Boonsboro Turnpike.

SOME UNWRITTEN WAR HISTORY.

Reminder of Interesting Events of Years Ago From the Pen of Mr. J. A. Miller, of Keedsville, Who at That Time Was 6 Years Old.

The old gum tree that stands alongside the Boonsboro and Sharpsburg Turnpike, about two hundred yards west of Antietam Creek, yet remains a monument of a bit of war history that has never been written, and to a few a reminder of interesting events long ago, by many forgotten.

It was a hot summer day like when Maud Muller "raked the meadows sweet with hay," but the visions that danced in Maud's tender and innocent mind had no place in the minds of either young or old among the residents of this part of Washington county on that memorable day in August, 1864, when the gleam of the glistening bayonet and keen-edged saber flashed from hill top to mountain side, and the clatter of horses' hoofs resounded along the dusty highway with here and there squads of cavalry dashing through clouds of dust, sometimes through fields of tasseled corn, pasture lands or ploughed fields, ever keeping a watchful eye on the movements of the Johnnies whose superior forces had again invaded "My Maryland" on one of the raids so notable that year for driving away our cattle and taking all the horses they could find.

The Confederate forces were variously estimated at twelve thousand to fifteen thousand men, mostly infantry, and having charge of a wagon train. "Our men," as the "Boys in Blue," were familiarly known and named among us, numbered four hundred or less and were a portion of Colonel Cole's cavalry, noted for their courage and daring exploits in the face of the enemy. Under the command of Col. George W. F. Vernon (now a resident of Baltimore), a detachment of cavalry crossed South Mountain by the National Turnpike and charged the Confederates who were in the immediate vicinity of Boonsboro, driving them toward the Potomac river. It was the purpose of Colonel Cole to protect the citizens and property in Antietam Valley, and if possible to capture a part of the Confederate wagon train and take it across South Mountain.

As the sun was fast approaching the zenith of its glory that day, David Kretzer, who enlisted March 17th, 1864, in Company H. P. H. B. cavalry, left his home in Keedysville, where he spent a few hours with his family, and cautiously, but hurridly, made his way toward the little village of Porterstown to join his comrades. Finding them in the deep ravine between Porterstown and Antietam Creek, he ascended the hill to the south on which was located a brick house and large red barn, owned and occupied by John Ecker. From this elevation he had a full view of the entire field of operations. He at once hastened to join his company and came to the turnpike about two hundred yards east of the bridge, where a comrade was concentrating his muscular power on the trunk of a large gum tree, endeavoring to chop it down and throw it across the road and check the advance of the Confederate forces.

The axe being very dull, slow progress was made on the tough and wiry gum which stood the storms of many years and was now almost a match for the sturdy and brave soldier, who now and then heard the creeping "whiz" of the Minie balls from a sharpshooter on the hill a half mile westward. Comrade Kretzer took his turn at trying to fell the old gum tree, but the "whistling whiz" became much more frequent, proving that the advance line of the enemy was getting nearer. The situation was becoming critical and rather than take further risks they decided to abandon any further attempt to get the tree across the pike To this day the old tree still holds its place and the marks made by the axe almost forty-one years ago, although grown over by the gnarly gum, is plainly seen on both sides of the trunk.

The Confederates kept on advancing, at the same time throwing a detachment across the creek at Burnside's Bridge, made an attempt to flank Colonel Vernon's men by reaching the road leading from Porterstown across the mountain to Rohrersville, at the same time the main column engaging the attention of the Union forces by desultory firing from the hill just west of the bridge. This movement was observed by Benjamin F. Miller from the upper story of the Ecker farm house. He at once hastened down a small ravine, unobserved by the Johnnies, to the turnpike, and informed Colonel Vernon, who doubted his statement, he being a stranger to the colonel. The Federal forces little dreamed of the size of the army they were fighting, and kept on firing at the enemy with the determination to check the advance and if possible to drive them across the Potomac river. Mr. Miller repeated what he told Colonel Vernon and added, "If you don't get your men out of this place in a few minutes, your escape will be impossible." For a verification of his statement, Mr. Miller appealed to several of Colonel Vernon's men whom he had known six or eight year, among them being Eli D. Valentine (now deceased), who vouched for every word Mr. Miller had told the colonel. "Retreat" was the order, and in an instant the entire cavalry force was in the saddle, and dashing through Porterstown made their escape to the mountain by the Rohrersville road, but not until they turned the Confederate flank movement at the edge of the timber after a sharp skirmish. One thing that caused Colonel Vernon to be resting easy was the fact that Company G was holding the bridge on which that company had dragged a large flat boat taken from the creek.

The Confederates, seeing their chances for the capture of Colonel Cole's men about gone, followed in hot pursuit, but refused to go beyond the outskirts of the mountain timber. It was indeed a close call, only a matter of a few minutes and retreat would have been completely cut off. One of the Confederate officers remarked afterward that their plans failed because they mistook the by-road or lane leading from the main road to the Thomas farm house for the mountain road, and did not hurry up their men enough to hold it.

Just over the mountain at the place now known as Mt. Briar lay several Pennsylvania regiments that never crowned themselves with patriotic glory. Had they taken the lower road to Sharpsburg via Burnside's Bridge, they could have given the Confeds a lot of trouble and no doubt have driven them out of Maryland in a few hours, and thus saved a lot of stock and other property for our farmers.

Many have been the changes since that memorable day. The writer, then a little boy less than six years of age, recalls a few of the incidents of that raid. The generation that then lived has passed away, and with two or possible three exceptions, no one is now living within a mile of the gum tree or bridge who witnessed the exciting scenes at that time. The tree still remains, but in a shaggy decaying condition, and may soon have to give way to the march of modern improvements that is, if the new trolley line goes that way. The bridge collapsed nearly fourteen years ago and went to the bottom of the stream. A new iron bridge took its place and now spans the creek. The mill near by that turned out two thousand to three thousand barrels of flour per year, much of which went by the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to Georgetown, ceased its work fifteen years or more ago and during the summer of 1904 was razed to the ground. Here is an invaluable water power awaiting some great enterprise when the right man with capital sees it.—J. A. Miller in the Hagerstown Herald and Torch-Light.

VALUABLE HELP TO REPUBLICANS.

Found In the Proposed Disfranchisement Amendment.

"The Republican party would prefer that the Court of Appeals reverse the decision of the lower court and sustain Governor Warfield in the disfranchising amendment to the Constitution," said Chairman John B. Hanna, of the Republican State Central Committee, yesterday, "but if the decision of the higher court should affirm that of the Circuit, we shall be prepared to accept the result and to plunge at once into the campaign to defeat the amendment. And a very warm campaign it will be—one of the warmest, in fact, ever witnessed in this state.

"It may be possible, with the amendment as an issue, that the Republican party will be a beneficiary. By that I mean that the unpopularity of the amendment will be so great that our candidates will be elected in a majority of the counties and in Baltimore city. I am sure that the amendment will play a most important part in the municipal campaign in Baltimore, and will prove to be a large aid to the Baltimore candidates, though I have no wish to inject politics into that campaign. People opposed to the amendment will express their opposition when they cast their votes at the May election, and there is no power to prevent such opposition.

"The Republicans will be favored in their campaign by the drastic features of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, should the validity of that amendment be upheld by the Court of Appeals. If the amendment were less drastic, and if it met the Democratic promises in the last state campaign, it would command the support of the whole Democratic party and possibly the support of a few Republicans, but when the people of this state, irrespective of party, consider that the power of registration is placed in haphazard boards of registry, and that certain foreigners and descendants of foreigners will be excluded from registration, under the 'grandfather's clause,' they will pause and reflect, and will realize what enormous power they are taking from themselves and placing into the hands of others to be used as a whip to lash them in the future.

"President Roosevelt's speech in New York last night, in which he dealt with the race problem in a masterly way, should bring to the people of Maryland the important lesson as to what shall become of the colored race, if we are to exclude them from the rights of suffrage simply because of their color. I wish every man in Maryland would read the President's speech and study its meaning carefully.

"The Republican State Central Committee is proceeding on the theory that the opinion of the Court of Appeals be favorable to the validity of the amendment without the Governor's signature. We have already done much work designed to defeat the amendment, and just as soon as the decision of the court is made known we shall be prepared to proceed with the campaign, not along defensive, but along aggressive lines.

Sheridan Dodging Battle

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

August 12-15, 1864

Copyright, 1904, by G. L. Kilmer.]

PHIL SHERIDAN came out of the war with reputation for fighting on sight. This was far from the truth, like many another war tradition, and it is said that he once led the march of his division away from the sound of the guns in an emergency when to most soldiers the watchword was "Victory or death!" Of course it was not personal timidity which made Sheridan cautious about pitching in; rather a fear of being whipped and getting a black eye for his reputation, which was an uncertain quantity until the time of his famous ride from Winchester, in October, 1864.

Two months almost to a day previous to the disastrous retreat and heroic rally at Cedar creek Sheridan was heading a retreat over the same ground and refusing battle to an inferior foe. The circumstances which brought about this well nigh bloodless campaign on Cedar creek, the middle of August, 1864, were connected with the Confederate raid on Washington by General Jubal Early's command the previous July. Early's bold incursion to the gates of the northern capital had the effect of drawing a new system of warfare to Shenandoah valley. From the beginning of the war the valley region, so convenient for the shelter of a hostile force on the flanks of a Federal army operating in northern Virginia, had not been occupied by one good, consolidated Federal command.

Stonewall Jackson fought one Federal army under General Fremont and another under General Banks on alternate days in 1862 and defeated both. After that General Sigel had a Federal command there, General J. D. Cox another and General B. F. Kelley still another, all charged with looking after the Confederates in and around the valley. Later General Milroy, General Kelley and General French had separate commands supposed to be available to prevent the Confederates from occupying the region in force, but Robert E. Lee made it a highway when he chose to do so, as in the Antietam and Gettysburg campaigns of 1862 and 1863, and drew upon it as a granary of war supplies at leisure. Then came General Crook, General Sigel again and General Hunter, these last in 1864, but at the end of a hard summer's campaign Early held the valley, and the Federal forces, composed of the remnants of the old valley commands and the Sixth corps from the Army of the Potomac, were huddled close to the bank of the Potomac river with Grant on the ground devising some method to solve the problem of protecting Washington from valley incursions while the main army was fighting along the lower James.

During the excitement of Early's raid on Washington in July Sheridan had come to the rescue with a division of cavalry. An arrangement to have General Hunter, the nominal Federal chief in the valley department, and Sheridan act together failed. Hunter left the field and the four old departments were consolidated into the middle military division under Sheridan's command. The forces constituted an army and comprised the Sixth and Nineteenth corps of infantry and three divisions of cavalry under General Wesley Merritt, General J. H. Wilson and General W. W. Averell.

By the middle of August Sheridan mustered in the field about 30,000 men and his opponent not over 10,000. Both were expecting re-enforcements for their own commands, and both were fearing that the enemy's re-enforcements would get to the ground first. Sheridan's came the fastest, and yet he proceeded with caution. When Early saw the great gathering of Federals at the head of the valley he placed his troops in front of Winchester, so often the bone of contention in the Shenandoah campaigns, but instead of standing for battle retreated leisurely down the excellent roads toward Strasburg. Every mile brought Early nearer to the re-enforcements coming up from Richmond, and it is one of the mysteries of the campaign why Sheridan, with his superior numbers and splendid cavalry, made no attempt to flank the enemy and get between him and his supports.

On the 12th of August Early, after leisurely choosing positions, established his line on Fisher's hill, two miles south of Strasburg. Sheridan followed up the bank of Cedar creek and contented himself with cavalry reconnoissances until satisfied that the enemy's re-enforcements were at hand. The one position which in his own hands would endanger the enemy and the one which in possession of the enemy would jeopardize his own rear he allowed to be seized by the Confederates marching up from Richmond. This was Front Royal, on the flank of the Cedar creek line and at the head of Luray valley.

The re-enforcements which came to Early at this time did not exceed 5,000 and probably were only 3,000, yet the Confederates so manipulated the incident as to frighten both Sheridan and Grant. A dispatch reached Sheridan by way of Harpers Ferry stating that heavy re-enforcements under Longstreet and Hill were within five days' march of the valley and that if Early was attacked by Sheridan before their arrival he was to show fight at Fisher's hill and fall back until he formed junction with the advancing forces. Sheridan anxiously besieged Washington and Grant at Petersburg for news and placed his army on the defensive. On the 13th of August a staff colonel rode into camp in hot haste with a telegram from Grant, at Petersburg, to Halleck, in Washington, stating that Lee had sent from Richmond to Early's aid "two divisions of infantry, some cavalry and twenty pieces of artillery." Grant said that Sheridan must be cautious, for Early was too much for him. In point of fact only one division of Confederate infantry joined Early—Kershaw's division, about 3,000 strong. Fitz Lee's cavalry brigade was on the way and numbered only 1,700 sabers.

Meanwhile Sheridan's own re-enforcements had been pushed to the front, and he had close at hand in the field and in garrison from 40,000 to 50,000 men, while Early, with the new troops sent him, did not muster over 15,000. Sheridan prepared to retreat and notified both Grant and Halleck. Said he: "So far as I have been able to see, there is not a military position in this valley south of the Potomac. The position here (Cedar creek) is a bad one, as I cannot cover the numerous rivers that lead in on both my flanks to the rear." He added that he would retreat at his leisure and take up a position at Winchester.

The retreat was not leisurely and did not stop at Winchester. From the famous signal station on Three Top mountain the Confederates discovered the movement in the Federal camp. Early set out from Fisher's hill in pursuit, and at the same time Kershaw's division marched from Front Royal on the flank of the retreating column. On the 15th there were several skirmishes between the Confederate infantry and the Federal cavalry which screened the flanks of the army. Fitz Lee's troopers had not reached the field, but the partisan band of Colonel Jack Mosby was quick to seize the opportunity offered by Sheridan's dilemma. It happened that the baggage wagons of General Merritt's cavalry division were moving from the Potomac to the front, unaware that the army was retreating. Mosby's men dashed into the train, scattering the guard of hundred days' men, and helped themselves to the rich spoils before applying the torch to the wagons. As the train was loaded with forage, subsistence stores and officers' baggage the prize was a rich one, even for Mosby's free lance band. A party of regular cavalry attempted to drive off the raiders, and in the melee Lieutenant Walker of the First cavalry was killed and Lieutenant Dwyer, Fifth cavalry, wounded and captured. Mosby's men were at home in the Shenandoah valley, and it is said they posed as sober citizens one minute and the next rode fully armed upon some daring foray, eager alike for fighting and plunder.

The town of Winchester, where Sheridan proposed to halt, is but one day's easy march from Cedar creek, and he would have lost but little ground had he stayed there. But instead he promptly turned eastward when he found the enemy at his heels and halted at Berryville, ten miles from Winchester. From there he wrote to Grant: "The position I held in front of Strasburg was a very bad one, from which I could be forced at any time precipitately. Winchester is untenable. I have therefore taken a position near Berryville which will enable me to get in their rear if they should get strong enough to push north."

The enemy was already in strong force at Winchester when Sheridan wrote, and, instead of attempting "to get in their rear," he retreated another ten miles to Charleston. Grant wired Sheridan that he had been mistaken as to the number of troops Lee had sent from Richmond to the valley, but Sheridan insisted that two fresh divisions had reached Early besides Fitz Lee's cavalry and some artillery. The whole country was alarmed at Sheridan's retreat, but when Early attacked him in position at Berryville he made but a feeble resistance and drew the army back to Halltown, close to the Potomac and under the protecting guns of Harpers Ferry. There he clung for a month besieged by a foe which he outnumbered about three to one. "I have taken the defensive" was his message to Grant. GEORGE L. KILMER.

LOCAL TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

Paper Read By Miss Hopkins—Other Proceedings of the Session.

The Local Teachers' Institute held in Oakland on Saturday of last week, was attended by about twenty teachers from the immediate vicinity of Oakland and also by a number of the residents of town, among them being Dr. E. H. Bartlett, Rev. J. B. Workman, Trustees Harned and Hinebaugh and County Superintendent Browning.

The printed program was carried out generally and interesting discussions were indulged in by those present.

The paper read by Prof. J. Frank McBee we have been unable to obtain, the same having been sent to a school journal of prominence and will be published therein. We present however, the paper read by Miss Hopkins, deeming it of sufficient interest to those teachers in other parts of the county who could not be present at the meeting to give it space in these columns. Miss Hopkins' paper follows:

The work in the primary grades is the most important we have to teach, because it is there that the foundation is laid for all future study. Therefore our teachers should plan and consider carefully, "How may I best present this subject to my class?" Of course this applies to every teacher from the lowest to the highest grades, but at present we shall consider only those who have special charge of the young, untrained minds.

Learning to read may be considered under two general heads. First, learning to recognize the symbols in which the known is preserved. Second, learning how to use these symbols so as to add to one's store of knowledge. The first requisite in teaching reading is to secure the interest of the child in the subject about which the reading lesson treats. How much interest shall be created is for the teacher to determine. All psychological philosophy and pedagogical consideration relating to the subject, point to the fact that the interest of the child is more easily and naturally secured if he is made to feel at home or perfectly familiar with the subject treated in the lesson before he reads about it.

Nearly every child has seen a bird, a nest, a tree and an egg. Even so, perhaps some have not observed these things as closely as others and their general ideas are not clear enough, so it is necessary for the teacher to produce a picture of them. Just as soon as she begins to question the children with regard to their experiences with these things, she has aroused their interest. Why? Because she has touched upon something about which they know and like to talk. Now is her opportunity to make a language lesson of this subject. Ask questions in such a manner as to draw from the children where they have seen the birds, what they were doing, size of them, etc., but always careful to have complete and correct sentences given. When the interest of the class has been thoroly aroused, then they are ready for something new which will be a presentation of the word or the symbol for bird.

A great many authors on primary reading claim that the script should be given first, followed later by the printed form. Write this word carefully on the board, give the children an opportunity to see it, then show them how you made it. To do this you may trace it with the chalk or with the pointer. Do not tell them what the letters are, simply say, "This word says bird." In a very short time they will recognize it, no matter where it is written. Now take several simple sentences that they have used with the word "bird" in them, writing them carefully on the board, and let the children find the word "bird." Tell them what the sentence says. Never let a single pupil read a sentence until he is ready to do so without a break. At the very first symptom of hesitation, stop him and tell him he must not read until he has his sentence ready. Of course he must have the privilege of asking for any word that he does not know. This mode of procedure seems to the inexperienced teacher a waste of time; but those whose experience is riper, know that the facility it brings, repays them for any loss of time.

Our first endeavor is to fix upon the child's mind the word as a whole, and its relation to the rest of the sentence. In order to do this we present the word to him in various ways. Some of them I have given. Now suppose he is ready for some busy work while you hear another class. If you have but a few first grade pupils, it would do well to write on the blackboard a word for every child and show him how to trace it. Or write it on little slips of paper and after showing them how you make it, let each one trace over your copy. Work of this kind done in various ways should receive a little time each day.

The transition from the script to the printed form comes very easily to most children. The teacher may, if she can print well enough, put the printed form on the board below the script and have the children become thoroly familiar with it that way before they take up their books. Or she may tell them that the first line in the book says the same thing as a line she puts on the board. If the interest of the child is properly aroused he will be anxious to read that about which he has been talking.

Do not fall into the error of telling children to hurry. You do not want them to hurry; you simply wish them to read in a natural manner without breaks. When the child reads without expression, draw it from him if possible, by questions or remarks on the subject matter of the sentence. Failing in this, read the sentence properly for him, and require him to read it after you.

Every reading lesson in any grade should be prepared before the lesson is given. That is, all unknown words should be written, pronounced, and talked about before they are read. This enables the child to read with more thought of the subject matter, and the reading of good English with such preparation is not only easy to the child, but soon becomes a delight to him.

I have endeavored to make this as practical as possible that is might offer some suggestions to those interested this subject.

DANIEL FRANCIS CAREY.

A Leading Farmer of Garrett County Passes to His Reward.

Mr. Daniel Francis Carey died at his residence about seven miles from Grantsville, in Garrett county, Md., at three o'clock on Tuesday morning of this week. He had been confined to his room and bed since last July, but death came to him peacefully and calmly. He was stricken with no disease, but his death was due mainly to old age, having nearly reached the advanced age of about eighty five years.

He was a pioneer farmer of that part of the county and was in his day a prominent citizen, highly respected and noted for his honesty, sobriety and charity. He resided on the homestead which he founded, for nearly sixty years, and no way-farer, friend or acquaintance ever entered his gates without being cheerfully received and showered with genuine Irish hospitality.

When about twenty years of age he took St. Matthew's Temperance pledge at St. Patrick's church, Cumberland, Md., from the first pastor of that parish, the Rev. Father Obermeyer, and from that day to the day of his death he never broke that pledge, and his strictly temperate habits were a shining example to all with whom he came into contact.

Mr. Carey was a native of County Mayo, Ireland, the son of Daniel and Elizabeth Carey, and came to this country with his parents when only 12 years of age, and settled at Carey, Ohio, but in his early youth he came to Maryland, where he has ever since resided.

Mr. Carey sprung from an ancient, noble and distinguished Irish family, being descended from the Carrolls, of Kings County, Ireland, the Loftus family, of Long Loftus, in Ireland, and the famous Carey family of Hunsdon. A number of his ancestors distinguished themselves as patriots in Ireland's cause in the memorable war of '98, where the loss of their fortunes and the cause for which they bravely fought was the only reward of their bravery.

Mr. Carey reared a large family on the homestead, which he founded, most of them survived him. They are Mr. E. J. Carey, of Springfield, Ill.; Mr. J. Owen Carey, of Pocahontas county, W. Va.; Mrs. Rose A. Galvin, of Cumberland, Md., Messrs. Thomas and James Carey, Miss Carey, and Mrs. Hugh McMahon, of Garrett county. His wife died about seven years ago.

His funeral took place this morning at 10:30 o'clock when a solemn requiem high mass was said over his remains in St. Michael's Catholic church at Frostburg, and interment was made in the cemetery connected with the church, where a few years ago he erected a family monument.

He was quite well-to-do, having left much valuable real estate. His farms are among the most beautiful and fertile in the county. During his declining years and especially since he became helpless in the past eight months he has been tenderly cared for by his children, Mrs. Galvin, of Cumberland, Mr. Tom, Miss Carey and Mrs. McMahon and several grandchildren being present at his bedside when death came.—Cumberland Times.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there has come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hogs and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

Tribute to Mrs. Wm. E. George.

(Republished by request)

Died, at her home in Deer Park, on January 31st, at 9.44 o'clock a. m. after suffering of many weeks, Mrs. Jane George, wife of Rev. Wm. E. George. Mrs. George was born in England, in 1824, being in her 82nd year at the time of her death. She leaves a devoted and aged husband and four loving children to mourn the loss of one of the most precious and kind mothers that any children could be blessed with in this life, and has left a void, an aching void, that will never be filled this side of the grave.

Funeral services were held in the M. E. church Feb. 3rd at 2 p. m. conducted by Rev. J. C. Price, of Swanton, assisted by Rev. Percy M. Metheney, Rev. W. H. Clary, of Deer Park, and Rev. Mr. Weigel of Cranesville, W. Va. Rev. Price took for his text part of the 23rd chapter of Genesis; the burial place of Sarah; and his discourse was so appropriate, in the burial of this aged mother in Israel, far away from the scenes of her youth, but no "strange and sojourner," with us in the home of her adoption for the past fifty-odd years. More than thirty she has spent in this county, and twenty in this place, where all who came to know was to love and admire, for the gentle and christian character and her four loving children, who loved her living and will mourn her dead.

The following gentlemen, all warm friends of the deceased and family acted as pall bearers. Active, George L. Lininger, Wm. B. Miller, S. P. Specht, W. C. Jones, L. D. Thrasher and George J. Walter; honorary. J. W. Laughlin, M. D., Abraham Freeland, Walter Engle, E. F. Droege, George Marley and Wm. D. Hoye.

The following appropriate hymns were sung at the funeral: "Asleep in in Jesus," "Nearer my God to Thee," "Jesus Lover of my Soul." "We'll Never Say Goodby in Heaven."

All that was mortal of this sainted wife, mother and friend was laid to rest in the Deer Park cemetery at 3:30 o'clock February 3rd, 1905.

Many and beautiful floral offerings crowned the casket donated by her devoted children and grand-children.

With all the sympathy of heart going out to the aged and feeble husband, left so lonely, O, so lonely in his old age after a wedded life of over sixty two years, with not a jar to molest the bliss of this happy union, but to this minister of the Gospel for over sixty years, we know with an acquaintance of twenty two years, that you will soon meet the loved one gone before, and will embrace the one most dear in a fairer clime than this.

With tears we close this humble tribute and ask heaven's richest blessing on all her children left behind, who will miss a mother's love in this life.

A TRUE FRIEND.

Order of Publication.

Amelia E. Poling vs. Isaac James Poling. No. 1319 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett county, Maryland.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree, divorcing the plaintiff, a vinculo matrimonii, from the defendant.

The bill states that the plaintiff and defendant were married in the year 1873 and that about ten years ago the defendant abandoned and deserted the plaintiff; that the conduct of the plaintiff towards her husband has always been kind and above reproach and that the defendant abandoned the plaintiff without just cause or reason and that such abandonment has continued uninterrupted for more than ten years and is deliberate and final and the separation of the parties beyond any reasonable expectation of reconciliation; that seven children have been born to said parties as a result of said marriage, the oldest of whom is thirty-one years of age and the youngest sixteen years of age; that the plaintiff desires to resume her maiden name, Amelia Elizabeth Shirley, and that the defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a decree divorcing the plaintiff and defendant a vinculo matrimonii; that the plaintiff be permitted to resume her maiden name and for general relief and an order of publication against the absent defendant.

It is thereupon, the 31st day of January, 1905, by the Circuit Court for Garret county, in Equity, ordered, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper, published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 4th day of March, 1905, give notice to the said absent defendant of the object and substance of this bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor on or before the 20th day of March next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" FENCES ARE WELDED BY ELECTRICITY.

This is the modern method of construction. Years of life are added through the elimination of serious fence defects.

A WRAP holds moisture, cracks the galvanizing and allows the water to attack the bare wire. A small amount of displaced galvanizing on "PITTSBURGH PERFECT" REINFORCES THE PROTECTION AGAINST RUST AT THE ELECTRICALLY WELDED JOINT; examine the joint.

STAYS CANNOT SLIP. They are always just where they were put. Stay and strand wires become one piece when the union is made. The fence is like a solid sheet of perforated steel.

Every Rod is Guaranteed Perfect.

Don't allow your prejudice in favor of the rapidly-declining and now antiquated methods you have heretofore known, to warp your good judgment.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" FENCES REPRESENT PROGRESS, because hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of standard material is daily welded by electricity.

The hoop on the average sugar barrel in the isolated country grocery store is an electrically welded product.

If your wagon was made in a large factory, its tires were welded by electricity.

You will find electrically welded hoops on ice cream freezers and washing machines, on many tubs and buckets. Examine them.

"PITTSBURGH PERFECT" fences are made by this modern, simple and marvelous process, producing "THE WELD THAT HELD."

MR. FARMER: LISTEN, NOW. Every agent handling "PITTSBURGH PERFECT" fences is authorized to guarantee this:

That the wires are not injured at the joints,
That the fence is perfectly adjustable to uneven ground.
That the stays will not separate from the strands.
That the fence is all right in every particular.

Could you ask any more definite protection? Your complete satisfaction is absolutely assured.

SUDDEN DEATH OF G. W. KITZMILLER.

Dropped Dead in Eutaw House in Baltimore Last Saturday Night.

WAS A PROMINENT COAL OPERATOR

Son of the Late Ebenezer Kitzmiller—Leaves Surviving Him His Wife and One Daughter—Funeral Yesterday.

Mr. George W. Kitzmiller, a prominent resident of District No. 13, of this county, dropped dead in the lobby of the Eutaw House in Baltimore on last Saturday evening at 7.25 o'clock, the cause of death being heart disease.

Mr. Kitzmiller had spent the day in Washington where he witnessed the inauguration of President Roosevelt and went over to Baltimore from that city to attend to some business before his return home. Mr. Kitzmiller had just registered as a guest of the hotel and was turning away from the desk when he was stricken. He was picked up from where he had fallen and conveyed to a room when a physician was summoned who made an examination of the body, stating that death was instantaneous.

His remains were prepared for burial in Baltimore and on Monday conveyed to his late home at Blaine, the funeral occurring yesterday morning at 10.30 o'clock, being conducted by the Methodist minister stationed at Blaine and a delegation from the Fraternal Order of Eagles from Cumberland, Piedmont and Keyser of which organization he was a valued member.

Besides his widow Mr. Kitzmiller leaves an only daughter, aged about fourteen years.

HUTTON

Mrs Wm. Canty fell and sprained her wrist badly. Dr. Legge attended her.

Miss Mary Shaffer spent Sunday with friends near Rowlesburg.

Judging by the number of drummers who visit this place daily, spring must have come.

Wonder if Tom White has really gone home to his family?

Wonder when the Sanders boys will go to work and give their father a rest?

Wonder if Swindler actually broke a rib?

Wonder if the robins are deceived, or is winter over?

HARRY WEST HAS NARROW ESCAPE

Was Caught Under Several Tons of Feed at the Dixon & Kelso Warehouse Saturday.

Mr. Harry West, who for some months has been in the employ of Messrs. Dixon & Kelso, the Second sereet merchants, in the capacity of warehouse-man, had a narrow escape with his life on Saturday morning last. As it was he escaped with painful injuries.

At the time of the accident Mr. West was engaged in getting out some sacked feed for a customer when the stack of several tons fell over, burying Mr. West underneath it. In falling he was thrown against a truck striking the handle with his face, inflicting a severe cut to his forehead and breaking his nose, besides severely wrenching both his arms and injuring his back to some extent. He extracted himself from his position and went to a physician who attended to his injuries. He will be unable to resume his duties for a week or more.

BITTINGER.

The funeral services and interment of Mrs. Ellen Stark were held at this place last Sabbath morning and was largely attended.

Mr. Cohen, a Jewish clothing dealer, came over to offer the Gentile bargain seekers of this section an opportunity to unload some of their surplus cash last week.

Mr. John Fye, of Keyser Ridge, was in town last Monday, with matrimonial intent, it is said.

Mr. Simon Brenneman has acquired a reputation for unusual skill in caring for promising infants, who are destined to be the great men of the future, and he should be recognized as a benefactor of the highest type.

Mr. T. B. Wiley and F. M. Bittinger were transacting business in Grantsville last Monday.

Many of our farmers are scalding keelers this week, preparatory to opening their camps for the approaching sugar season.

Mr. Harvey Custer, the hustling liveryman of Jennings, was a business caller here last Monday.

Accident to a Coaster.

Saturday night a number of young men were coasting down Alder street on an "eastern" with Frank Harne guiding when he lost control of the sled and collided with a pile of boxes in front of the Ravenscroft building resulting in a broken finger and some minor injuries to Mr. Harne. The other occupants of the sled escaped injury.

ROOSEVELT INAUGURATED 'MID SCENES OF SPLENDOR

Rough Riders, Governors, Filipinos, Indian Chiefs In Parade of 30,000 Men.

SHORT, STRIKING INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

President Declares We Must Solve Problems of Accumulatep Wealth—Inaugural Ball a Dazzling Scene—Warfield Cheered By Thousands in Parade.

STRIKING SENTENCES FROM PRESIDENT'S INAUGURAL.

Toward all other nations, large and small, our attitude must be one of cordial and sincere friendship.

No weak nation that acts manfully and justly should ever have cause to fear us, and no strong power should ever be able to single us out as a subject for insolent aggression.

Never before have men tried so vast and formidable an experiment as that of administering the affairs of a continent under the forms of a democratic republic.

If we fail, the cause of free self-government throughout the world will rock to its foundation.

There is no good reason why we should fear the future, but there is every reason why we should face it seriously neither hiding from ourselves the gravity of the problems before us nor fearing to approach these problems with the unbending, unflinching purpose to solve them aright.

We have an assured confidence that we shall be able to leave this heritage unwasted and enlarged to our children and our children's children.

Washington, March 4.—Theodore Roosevelt today entered the Presidency in his own right. The inaugural ceremonies from the ride to the Capitol, where the oath of office was administered, to the concluding brilliancy of the inaugural ball, were characteristic of the man being inducted into office.

High color and unexpected contrasts gave brilliant spectacular effect and marked the ceremonies as Mr. Roosevelt's own. He coined the expression "President in his own right," as distinguished from the Presidency held by succession, and the impress of individuality was upon this entire day's proceedings. Theodore Roosevelt was not an official being passively inducted into office. The dominant quality of his character was felt in the intense regularity and gorgeousness of military pomp and in the easy swagger of cowboys of the plains. The startling contrast was characteristic, and he seemed to be equally in sympathy both with the pomp and with the easy indifference of the ranchmen.

All anxiety about the weather conditions was relieved with the rising of the sun this morning in a clear sky. The day was as nearly perfect as could be desired, it being warm enough to render an overcoat unnecessary, and the bright sunshine brought out all the color and beauty of the scene.

The President rode to the Capitol escorted by the men who were associated with his advancement through war to political eminence. At the Capitol he was met by the most distinguished officials of this Government and by the representatives of all nations. From the east front of the great legislative building, surrounded by the Senators and Representatives in Congress, justices of the Supreme Court, Ambassadors and other representatives of foreign nations, Governors of States and the highest officers of the army and navy, he took the oath of office administered by the Chief Justice and addressed a multitude of cheering citizens, who pressed from as far as the eye could reach and almost trampled upon each other to get within sound of his voice.

Surprising everybody by the brevity of his address and causing many to wonder at the significance of words, which were full of suggestion without directly announcing a policy, he turned with the promptness of military action from his civilian surroundings and proceeded to the White House, where, after hastily disposing of a luncheon, at which he had a number of distinguished guests, he went upon the grand reviewing stand, from which he reviewed the most remarkable parade that has ever passed before any President of the United States. At night he viewed the fireworks from the rear of the White House and then participeted in an inaugural ball, the brilliancy of which has never been surpassed.

In his honor people were assembled today from every part of the United States and from the remote islands which represent acquisition by expansion of national empire. The North, the South, the East and the West were represented in the imposing parade which marched before him to salute the President of the United States. Democrats and Republicans, Confederate soldier and Union soldier, Indians and palefaces, Filipinos and Porto Ricans, cowboys and fellows of the great institutions of learning, civilians in all walks of life, commanders and the Governors of sovereign States were here to do honor to the occasion.

In magnificence of display this inauguration has not been surpassed, and the 200,000 persons coming from all directions to witness the ceremonies talked and acted and cheered and shouted as it, somehow, they felt themselves to be peculiarly close to the man they were seeing to the White House for a term in his own right.

The President reviewed the grand parade from a beautifully constructed stand in front of the White House, facing the Court of History, the chef d'œuvre of the feast of beauty, which was the acme of the decorative scheme, occupying the street for about four blocks. Here were assembled the allegorical figures of heroic size and the portrait statues brought from the World's Fair, and the bamboo masts, each crowned with a laurel wreath and all connected with graceful festoons of green and electric bulbs, lifted their slender and graceful outlines 30 feet in the air.

The most striking thing in the whole ceremony was the all-prevading personality of the President. Amid all the crush and confusion of the enormous crowd, the ceasless strain of music from a hundred bands and the military and civic display there was a psychic something which made the ceremony different from any other and marked it with the stamp of Roosevelt. Washington has seen many inauguration crowds before, has heard the music of a multi-

ASSAULTED IN HIS OWN HOUSE

Judson Foster, a Farmer, the Victim of a Foreigner.

Last Sunday afternoon a passenger on train No. 55 who later proved to be a foreigner, was left at the station here by the train pulling out. The man struck out Third street and went on out Hooppole Road through the fields, walking at a very rapid gait which he maintained until out of sight of a number of persons he passed on the way.

At a point several miles north of town he evidently became bewildered in the woods when his shouts were heard by Mr. Judson Foster, who resides on a farm midway between Oakland and Deep Creek. Mr. Foster took the man into his house and administered to his wants by feeding him and allowing him to warm by his stove. After being in the house an hour or more, without an indication of what he intended to do, the stranger caught up a piece of stove wood from the floor and made an assault upon his benefactor, striking him over the head with it, inflicting a very deep and painful wound. Luckily some other men were present in the house who came to Mr. Foster's help and by their united efforts the man was overpowered and later brought to jail by Sheriff Frantz.

Monday afternoon the prisoner was accorded a hearing before Justice Gonder when the fact developed that he had been a passenger on train No. 55 from New York for St. Louis, arriving in this country but recently from Macednia and unable to speak other than his native language, Greek, which was interpreted by Mr. Jacobowitz, the jeweler, who is master of several languages.

After leaving the station the man evidently became bewildered and struck off at random, arriving at Foster's in a dazed condition owing to the cold prevailing at the time. At the trial the prisoner stated through his interpreter that he was afraid Foster and the other men at the house intended doing him some injury and hence the assault.

The Justice committed the man for court upon the charge of assault with intent to murder.

Application for Pardon.

A numerously signed petition was forwarden to Governor Warfield from Oakland today asking His Excellency to pardon from the penitentiary Jeremiah Burkholder who was sentenced about eight years ago to serve a life term for a criminal offense.

The petition was signed by nine of the twelve jurors who sat in the case, the local attorneys and the prosecuting attorney, besides a great number of laymen of Oakland and Bittinger where the convict lived prior to the commission of the crime.

Closing of Schools.

The public schools throughout the county will close on April 7th, when all teachers are expected to make their term and monthly reports to the Board of School Commissioners.

REPUBLICAN MUNICIPAL NOMINATIONS

A Good Ticket Placed in the Field by Republicans Last Night.

BOLDEN, LEGGE AND LAUER

The Nominees—The Former Has Served Many Terms and All Three are Excellent and Progressive Business Men.

Last night, subject to circular issued the evening previous calling for a meeting of the Republicans of Oakland to assemble at the City Hall and place in nomination a municipal ticket of three persons for members of the Council, many representative Republicans of the municipality met at 7 o'clock for the purpose specified.

Mr. Julius C. Renninger was made president of the convention and Mr. N. S. Heindel its secretary. The president stated the objects of the meeting when Mr. D. E. Bolden, Dr. John E. Legge, Mr. Henry Lauer and Mr. George W. Fleming were put in nomination.

The ballots cast resulted in the choice of Messrs. Bolden, Legge and Lauer for the offices to be filled by election on Monday of next week when Messrs. Bolden, Ross and Dixon retire.

The three nominees of last night are representative and progressive business men and if they should be elected, which no doubt they will be, the town's interests will be well protected.

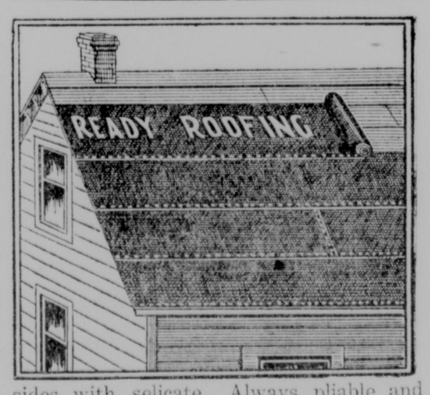
TO CONSTRUCT A RAILROAD

West Virginia, Pittsburg and Atlantic Railroad Company Incorporated.

The West Virginia, Pittsburg and Atlantic railroad company has been chartered to run a road from Rowlesburg, Preston county, to Durbin, Pocahontas county, with the following incorporators: C. W. Mosser and C. E. Mower, of Hendricks, W. Va.; E. D. Baker, of Berkely, W. Va.; A. J. Armstrong, of Parsons, W. Va., and R. F. Whitmer, of Philadelphia, Pa. The length of the line will be about one hundred miles and the route lies in the valley of Cheat river from Rowlesburg to the forks of the river at Parsons. Thence it will pass up Black Fork three miles to Hendricks, where it will intersect the Dry Fork railroad. From Hendricks to Durbin the line is already built. At Rowlesburg the line would meet the Morgantown and Kingwood railroad which is building to that place. Mr. Whitmer, one of the incorporators, is a part owner of the Dry Fork railroad, and Mr. Mosser is an officer of the road.

Only ten cents and up, double roll Matthews' opposite old post office. Has car load wall paper. Call and examine. 49-8t.

CLIMAX ASPHALT



Is the Best Ready Roofing Material Known

EXTREMELY durable. Densely compressed. Made from the best wool felt. Not affected by heat or cold. Coated on both sides with selicate. Always pliable and flexible. Resists the action of Vapor Acids or Fire. Does not stick together in rolls. Is easily affixed. Is impregnated with and improved by superior Damp Proof Materials, which cannot evaporate, and therefore requires no annual painting. Is superior in texture and more firmly compressed than felt or any similar material. Does not (like felt) absorb moisture; it cannot therefore be affected by the action of frost and consequently preserves a close and even surface.

BEYOND HIS MEANS

By EVERETT HOLBROOK

Copyright, 1904, by Frederick R. Toombs

THE brief advertisement stated that an unfurnished apartment, "rent very reasonable," was to be had at a certain address. The locality was not remote from fashionable regions, but was itself somewhat on the decline. Mr. Bransfield had a fair mental picture of it showing a row of small, old style buildings between more modern structures adjoining the avenues. Possibly a young man in hard luck and condemned to the severest economy might find something suitable to his means.

The street seemed to have improved, however, when Bransfield came to it, or was the difference in his own pocket?

The last time that he remembered having passed that way was in May. He was then the local manager of the Farrell Aluminium company, with a salary of $300 a month and fat commissions, and, though he had just lost nearly all his savings in an unwise investment, he certainly did not feel poor. But in October there wasn't any Farrell Aluminium company on earth and hadn't been any since the grand smashup of early June, and Edgar Bransfield was manager of nothing, with a salary of nothing and no commissions.

He had never sought employment before. He had been thrust into the aluminium company immediately upon leaving college and for eight years had climbed from one round of the ladder to the next. Suddenly the ladder itself had vanished, leaving him standing with both feet planted on the empty air. He had been hopeful at first, then perplexed and finally scared. His faith in himself as a business man was unimpaired, but he had discovered that there was one commodity which he did not know how to sell—namely, his own services.

At the time when he went in search of an unfurnished room—to be fitted up with a few odds and ends rescued from the aluminium company's offices—he was considering an offer of a position with a salary that would just fall short of paying his board in the house where he had been living; hence the need of a change in his arrangements.

As he walked along the street he was grieved to discover that the number mentioned in the advertisement designated was one of the best kept and most attractive buildings. It looked like a nice place to live, but not for Edgar Bransfield. He would have preferred to see a somewhat shabby exterior.

His own exterior, by the way, was anything but shabby. He was wearing a suit of clothes so good that he had been tempted that morning to pawn it, but had passed sentence upon his dress clothes instead and had obtained a loan of $7 upon them. He still had a small sum in a bank, but had resolved that it should not be less until he had taken employment promising an income in excess of his expenses.

He looked up at No. 37 and observed a push button labeled "Janitor," but when he had ascended the steps he hesitated. After all, why ring the bell? A mere glance inside would satisfy him that the building contained no room at the proper price, and he might be spared a petty humiliation.

As he stood irresolute in the hall a young gentleman came in hurriedly and called out, "Hello, Allen!" but apologized as soon as Bransfield turned to face him. Obviously there must be a bulky six footer named Allen among the tenants.

"Looking for the janitor?" inquired the young gentleman, pausing upon the stairs. And then, without waiting for a reply, he put his head over the banister rail and yelled "Jack!"

Instantly a youth in shirt sleeves and without a hat appeared from below as if shot up through a trapdoor. He had yellow hair in a wavy pompadour and bright blue eyes; upon the whole, a very animated and cheerful person to have about the house. Bransfield admired enthusiasm and despised a sour man in any station, yet he felt himself too nervous upon the present occasion to appreciate so prompt and startling a servitor.

"Right this way, sir," said the janitor and was halfway up the first flight of stairs before the words were fairly out of his mouth. Bransfield followed because he was ashamed to flee.

They ascended a second flight and turned toward the front of the house. Bransfield wished it had been the rear, for his mind was engaged in saving money. A lock clicked and a door swung open. He beheld a small room tastefully papered, having a hardwood floor as clean as a plate, a spotless ceiling and glass in the window washed to the point of invisibility.

"How much?" he began.

"Open plumbing, hot and cold water," said Jack. And Bransfield, looking over his shoulder, saw an alarmingly elegant bowl with gleaming spigots.

"I'll commit a small extravagance for this outfit," said he to himself. "Say eighteen a month."

"Always plenty of hot water here and in the bath," said Jack, opening a door.

"The bath!" echoed Bransfield.

"There's a tub that's big enough to swim in," said the janitor, with pride.

He crossed the room and pulled aside a curtain.

"This 'pourteer,'" said he, "stays if you want it. The tenant didn't take it away, and we throw it in. Now we'll look at the parlor."

"The parlor!" murmured Bransfield, putting his hand to his forehead.

He passed the "pourteer" and entered a very cheery room as neat as the other and exceedingly attractive.

"Steam heat," said Jack, "and a nice grate if you like to use it. Here's a locker where you can keep a bit of soft coal, or I'll bring it up from the cellar as you need it. Either way will suit me."

"My young friend"— began Bransfield sadly, but the sprightly janitor interrupted him.

"Telephone connections," said he, touching some stubs of wire that protruded from the wall. "Most gentlemen want a telephone these days, but, of course, you don't have to have it."

Bransfield could not think of anybody whom he should ever care to call up unless it might be the commissioner of public charity, yet he viewed the wires with a melancholy interest.

Jack darted a glance at him and mistook the symptoms. He compressed his lips, hitched up his trousers and doubled his enthusiasm.

"They may look a little bare with nothing in 'em," said he, "but when you get all your stuff in here and fixed up nice—couches and hangings and pictures and all that—I tell you it will look out of sight."

Bransfield slowly shook his head.

"Yes, it will," persisted Jack. "You ought to see Mr. Allen's rooms. They're just like these, only they're at the back. Come on, he'll let you look at 'em. He'll be glad to. And then you'll see what you can do with these."

"Couldn't think of it—impossible—perfect stranger," protested Bransfield. But Jack was already in the hall.

Bransfield took a last regretful look at the elegant little sitting room which could never be his and made a lingering and wistful exit. Immediately he was aware of a big handsome fellow in a dinner coat who stood by an open door at the other end of the hall.

"What does he look like, Jack?" he demanded in a heavy, deep toned voice which he had tried to suppress to a whisper. And then he caught sight of Bransfield in the broad light from the doorway. "Certainly," he cried. "Delighted. Come in, won't you?"

The manner of this invitation was most flattering, involving the instant recognition which a gentleman values, especially after three months of such humiliations as attend the dreary process of looking for a "job." Bransfield permitted himself to be ushered into an apartment which was a man's room at the first glance, full of such things as a fellow of spirit gathers and values, having the simplicity and directness of the old college style, with gleanings from the broader world harmoniously added.

"Upon my word," said Allen, "this is too good to be true. You must understand," he added, "that I'm more or less of a crank. I take strong likes and dislikes, and, really, if you could have seen your predecessor"—

"He was pretty loud for fair," said Jack. "I always spoke well of him while he was here, but he was a whole band wagon; that's what he was."

Allen raised his right forefinger with an almost imperceptible gesture, which had an immediate and beneficial effect upon the too exuberant janitor.

"I think I heard the bell, sir," said he. "I'll be back in a jiffy."

"In one month," said Allen, closing the door, "we can train that boy up to the level of the ideal. As for taking care of the rooms, there never was his equal, and his cheerfulness is worth $10 off the rent. But he's been spoiled." And Allen frowned in the direction of the front rooms.

"I am afraid you may be disappointed in me as a neighbor," said Bransfield. "I am not Stealthy Foot, the human mouse. I make some noise once in awhile."

"It isn't what a man does; it's what he is," responded Allen. "You may celebrate the Fourth of July every day in the year if you feel like it. Your predecessor's loudness was not so much audible as visible. He wore an automobile lamp on the third finger of each hand, and all his acquaintances were out of town customers whom he used to hold firmly by the arm as he led them upstairs. The air was full of dollar signs after they had passed."

"No such nimbus has surrounded me," said Bransfield, "since the Farrell company"—

"By jingo!" exclaimed Allen. "You're Edgar Bransfield of that aluminium concern. A fellow pointed you out to me one day—classmate of yours. I'm a Cornell man, too; freshman when you were a senior, so of course you don't remember me. It's a pity that company of yours went up, but of course a fellow of your reputation wouldn't have any difficulty in making another connection."

"The fact is," stammered Bransfield, "I—I haven't done it yet, and perhaps that's why I'm feeling economical."

"Quite so," responded Allen. "But, after all, those rooms are good enough. I don't see anything in this extravagant living. Why pay for a lot of elevators and uniformed lackeys and other frills that are mere nuisances? You'll be far better contented in a quiet place like this at fifty a month."

BRANSFIELD WAS INTRODUCED TO COLONEL AUSTIN MILLER.

"Fifty," said Bransfield. "Very moderate, of course. Yet"—

"I'll tell you what!" cried Allen. "Come around to the club and dine with me, and we'll talk it all over."

"I'm not in dress," pleaded Bransfield. "I haven't been going out much. All my evening clothes are packed away."

"Confound the clothes! Or see here! Fellows from one college, and all that, you understand, we're built as near alike as my two thumbs. I can fit you out from collar to shoes. Your hat's all right. It'll save a lot of time."

During the brief walk to the club, however, he recovered his self command, and he resolved to give Allen a complete statement of the situation while they were dining, but just as he began this painful recital two men paused beside the table, and Allen introduced his guest, with the result that the four ate together with great good fellowship. Bransfield could not summon up courage to proceed with his story in the presence of so numerous an audience, and afterward when they had adjourned to the billiard room the situation was no better.

In the course of the game which followed Bransfield noticed that Allen exhibited a certain uneasiness and that he frequently glanced toward the door. The entrance of a tall, florid man of fifty years relieved the tension; obviously it was he for whom Allen had been waiting.

Between shots Bransfield was introduced to Colonel Austin Miller, and in the next interval Colonel Miller said:

"Mr. Allen tells me that you were with the Farrell company."

"Yes," said Bransfield; "yes."

Before he could say more it was his turn to play. He ran half a dozen and marked them up.

"Our young friend informs me that you are about to make another connection," said Colonel Miller.

A cold sweat broke out on Bransfield's back. He perceived that Allen had recommended him to Colonel Miller and that he ought to say or do something to help the good work along. What, oh, what?

A miss by his opponent rescued him, but his own nerves were in such bad shape that he shot wide.

"From what Mr. Allen tells me," said Colonel Miller, "I think it might be worth while for you and me to have a talk before you make a decision."

"The fact is"— Bransfield began, and just then the other fellow miscued.

"The fact is," said Allen, but Bransfield did not wait to hear what it was. When he finished his inning Colonel Miller handed him a card.

"If those other people are pressing you for an answer," said he, "perhaps you'd better see me tomorrow forenoon—the Miller-Kirkwall company."

"Thank you," said Bransfield. "This is really kind. You see, I"—

"Your shot!" interposed Allen in his thundering bass.

Bransfield studied the position, trying to steady his nerves meanwhile. Then he missed by a long inch. When he turned Colonel Miller had disappeared.

"I sent him away," said Allen. "I was afraid you might thank him again. Why the deuce should you thank him? He's been having a confounded hard time to find a good man, as I happen to know. Now he's found one, and the tickets for the ice cream soda are on him. They're not on you, and don't you forget that tomorrow morning. I told him what the Farrell company paid you, and it didn't frighten him a bit."

"How the deuce did you know what they paid me?" demanded Bransfield.

"I imagined it, by jingo!" exclaimed Allen. "A hundred a week and commissions. Is that enough?"

"Saints of paradise!"

"Now, will you take those rooms?"

"I may not land him," Bransfield began.

"Land him? I've landed him. Now let's go home and break the good news to Jack."

The Simple Life

By CHARLES WAGNER

restores; one stirs up quarrels, another appeases them; one makes tears to flow, another wipes them away; one lives for evil doing, another dies for the right. And in the workings of this grievous law lies salvation. This also is logic, but a logic of facts which makes the logic of theories pale. The conclusion of the matter is not doubtful. A single hearted man draws it thus: Given the evil, the great thing is to make it good and to set about it on the spot. Well indeed if Messrs. the Malefactors will contribute to the reparation, but experience warns us not to count too much on their aid.

But, however simple duty may be, there is still need of strength to do it. In what does this strength consist or where is it found? One could scarcely tire of asking. Duty is for man an enemy and an intruder so long as it appears as an appeal from without. When it comes in through the door he leaves by the window; when it blocks up the windows he escapes by the roof. The more plainly we see it coming the more surely we flee. It is like those police, representatives of public order and official justice, whom an adroit thief succeeds in evading. Alas, the officer, though he finally collar the thief, can only conduct him to the station, not along the right road. Before man is able to accomplish his duty he must fall into the hands of another power than that which says, "Do this, do that; shun this, shun that, or else beware!"

This is an interior power; it is love. When a man hates his work or goes about it with indifference all the forces of earth cannot make him follow it with enthusiasm, but he who loves his office moves of himself; not only is it needless to compel him, but it would be impossible to turn him aside. And this is true of everybody. The great thing is to have felt the sanctity and immortal beauty in our obscure destiny; to have been led by a series of experiences to love this life for its griefs and its hopes; to love men for their weakness and their greatness and to belong to humanity through the heart, the intelligence and the soul. Then an unknown power takes possession of us, as the wind of the sails of a ship, and bears us toward pity and justice, and, yielding to its irresistible impulse, we say, "I cannot help it; something is there stronger than I." In so saying the men of all times and places have designated a power that is above humanity, but which may dwell in men's hearts. And everything truly lofty within us appears to us as a manifestation of this mystery beyond. Noble feelings, like great thoughts and deeds, are things of inspiration. When the tree buds and bears fruit it is because it draws vital forces from the soil and receives light and warmth from the sun. If a man, in his humble sphere, in the midst of the ignorance and faults that are his inevitably, consecrates himself sincerely to his task, it is because he is in contact with the eternal source of goodness. This central force manifests itself under a thousand forms. Sometimes it is indomitable energy; sometimes winning tenderness; sometimes the militant spirit that grasps and uproots the evil; sometimes maternal solicitude, gathering to its arms from the wayside where it was perishing, some bruised and forgotten life; sometimes the humble patience of long research. All that it touches bears its seal, and the men it inspires know that through it we live and have our being. To serve it is their pleasure and reward. They are satisfied to be its instruments, and they no longer look at the outward glory of their office, well knowing that nothing is great, nothing small, but that our life and our deeds are only of worth because of the spirit which breathes through them.

CHAPTER VI.

SIMPLE NEEDS.

WHEN we buy a bird of the fancier, the good man tells us briefly what is necessary for our new pensioner, and the whole thing—hygiene, food and the rest—is comprehended in a dozen words. Likewise, to sum up the necessities of most men, a few concise lines would answer. Their regime is in general of supreme simplicity, and so long as they follow it all is well with them, as with every obedient child of Mother Nature. Let them depart from it, complications arise, health fails, gayety vanishes. Only simple and natural living can keep a body in full vigor. Instead of remembering this basic principle we fall into the strangest aberrations.

What material things does a man need to live under the best conditions? A healthful diet, simple clothing, a sanitary dwelling place, air and exercise. I am not going to enter into hygienic details, compose menus or discuss model tenements and dress reform. My aim is to point out a direction and tell what advantage would come to each of us from ordering his life in a spirit of simplicity. To know that this spirit does not rule in our society we need but watch the lives of men of all classes. Ask different people of very unlike surroundings this question: What do you need to live? You will see how they respond. Nothing is more instructive. For some aboriginals of the Parisian asphalt there is no life possible outside a region bounded by certain boulevards. There one finds the respirable air, the illuminating light, normal heat, classic cookery, and, in moderation, so many other things without which it would not be worth the while to promenade this round ball.

On the various rungs of the bourgeois ladder people reply to the question, What is necessary to live? by figures varying with the degree of their ambition or education, and by education is oftenest understood the outward customs of life, the style of house, dress, table—an education precisely skin deep. Upward from a certain income, fee or salary life becomes possible; below that it is impossible. We have seen men commit suicide because their means had fallen under a certain minimum. They preferred to disappear rather than retrench. Observe that this minimum, the cause of their despair, would have been sufficient for others of less exacting needs and enviable to men whose tastes are modest.

On lofty mountains vegetation changes with the altitude. There is the region of ordinary flora, that of the forests, that of pastures, that of bare rocks and glaciers. Above a certain zone wheat is no longer found, but the vine still prospers. The oak ceases in the low regions; the pine flourishes at considerable heights. Human life, with its needs, reminds one of these phenomena of vegetation.

At a certain altitude of fortune the financier thrives, the clubman, the society woman—all those, in short, for whom the strictly necessary includes a certain number of domestics and equipages as well as several town and country houses. Further on flourishes the rich upper middle class, with its own standards and life. In other regions we find men of ample, moderate or small means and very unlike exigencies. Then come the people, artisans, day laborers, peasants—in short, the masses—who live dense and serried like the thick, sturdy growths on the summits of the mountains, where the larger vegetation can no longer find nourishment. In all these different regions of society men live, and, no matter in which particular regions they flourish, all are alike human beings, bearing the same mark. How strange that among fellows there should be such a prodigious difference in requirements! And here the analogies of our comparison fail us. Plants and animals of the same families have identical wants. In human life we observe quite the contrary. What conclusion shall we draw from this if not that with us there is a considerable elasticity in the nature and number of needs?

Is it well, is it favorable to the development of the individual and his happiness and to the development and happiness of society, that man should have a multitude of needs and bend his energies to their satisfaction? Let us return for a moment to our comparison with inferior beings. Provided that their essential wants are satisfied, they live content. Is this true of men? No. In all classes of society we find discontent.

I leave completely out of the question those who lack the necessities of life. One cannot with justice count in the number of malcontents those from whom hunger, cold and misery wring complaints. I am considering now that multitude of people who live under conditions at least supportable. Whence comes their heartburning? Why is it found not only among those of modest though sufficient means, but also under shades of ever increasing refinement, all along the ascending scale, even to opulence and the summits of social place? They talk of the contented middle classes. Who talk of them? People who, judging from without, think that as soon as one begins to enjoy ease he ought to be satisfied. But the middle classes themselves—do they consider themselves satisfied? Not the least in the world. If there are people at once rich and content, be assured that they are content because they know how to be so, not because they are rich. An animal is satisfied when it has eaten; it lies down and sleeps. A man also can lie down and sleep for a time, but it never lasts. When he becomes accustomed to this contentment he tires of it and demands a greater. Man's appetite is not appeased by food; it increases with eating. This may seem absurd, but it is strictly true.

And the fact that those who make the most outcry are almost always those who should find the best reasons for contentment proves unquestionably that happiness is not allied to the number of our needs and the zeal we put into their cultivation. It is for every one's interest to let this truth sink deep into his mind. If it does not, if he does not by decisive action succeed in limiting his needs, he risks a descent, insensible and beyond retreat, along the declivity of desire.

He who lives to eat, drink, sleep, dress, take his walk—in short, pamper himself all that he can—be it the courtier basking in the sun, the drunken laborer, the commoner serving his belly, the woman absorbed in her toilets, the profligate of low estate or high, or simply the ordinary pleasure lover, a "good fellow," but too obedient to material needs—that man or woman is on the downward way of desire, and the descent is fatal. Those who follow it obey the same laws as a body on an inclined plane. Dupes of an illusion forever repeated, they think, "Just few steps more, the last, toward the thing down there that we covet; then we will halt." But the velocity they gain sweeps them on, and the farther they go the less able they are to resist it.

Here is the secret of the unrest, the madness, of many of our contemporaries. Having condemned their will to the service of their appetites, they suffer the penalty. They are delivered up to violent passions which devour their flesh, crush their bones, suck their blood and cannot be sated. This is not a lofty moral denunciation. I have been listening to what life says, and have recorded as I heard them some of the truths that resound in every square.

Has drunkenness, inventive as it is of new drinks, found the means of quenching thirst? Not at all. It might rather be called the art of making thirst inextinguishable. Frank libertinage, does it deaden the sting of the senses? No; it envenoms it, converts natural desire into a morbid obsession and makes it the dominant passion. Let your needs rule you, pamper them, you will see them multiply like insects in the sun. [illegible] the more they demand. He is senseless who seeks for happiness in material prosperity alone. As well undertake to fill the cask of the Danaides. To those who have millions, millions are wanting; to those who have thousands, thousands. Others lack a twenty franc piece or a hundred sous. When they have a chicken in the pot they ask for a goose; when they have the goose they wish it were a turkey, and so on. We shall never learn how fatal this tendency is. There are too many humble people who wish to imitate the great, too many poor workingmen who ape the well to do middle classes, too many shopgirls who play at being ladies, too many clerks who act the clubman or sportsman, and among those in easy circumstances and the rich are too many people who forget that what they possess could serve a better purpose than procuring pleasure for themselves, only to find in the end that one never has enough. Our needs, in place of the servants that they should be, have become a turbulent and seditious crowd, a legion of tyrants in miniature. A man enslaved to his needs may best be compared to a bear with a ring in its nose, that is led about and made to dance at will. The likeness is not flattering, but you will grant that it is true. It is in the train of their own needs that so many of those men are dragged along who rant for liberty, progress and I don't know what else. They cannot take a step without asking themselves if it might not irritate their masters. How many men and women have gone on and on, even to dishonesty, for the sole reason that they had too many needs and could not resign themselves to simple living! There are many guests in the chambers of Mazas who could give us much light on the subject of too exigent needs.

Let me tell you the story of an excellent man whom I knew. He tenderly loved his wife and children, and they all lived together, in France, in comfort and plenty, but with little of the luxury the wife coveted. Always short of money, though with a little management he might have been at ease, he ended by exiling himself to a distant colony, leaving his wife and children in the mother country. I don't know how the poor man can feel off there, but his family has a finer apartment, more beautiful toilets and what passes for an equipage. At present they are perfectly contented, but soon they will be used to this luxury—rudimentary after all. Then madam will find her furniture common and her equipage mean. If this man loves his wife, and that cannot be doubted, he will migrate to the moon if there is hope of a larger stipend. In other cases the roles are reversed and the wife and children are sacrificed to the ravenous needs of the head of the family, whom an irregular life, play and countless other costly follies have robbed of all dignity. Between his appetites and his role of father he has decided for the former, and he slowly drifts toward the most abject egoism.

This forgetfulness of all responsibility, this gradual benumbing of noble feeling, is not alone to be found among pleasure seekers of the upper classes—the people also are infected. I know more than one little household which ought to be happy, where the mother has only pain and heartache day and night, the children are barefoot, and there is great ado for bread. Why? Because too much money is needed by the father. To speak only of the expenditure for alcohol, everybody knows the proportions that has reached in the last twenty years. The sums swallowed up in this gulf are fabulous—twice the indemnity of the war of 1870. How many legitimate needs could have been satisfied with that which has been thrown away on these artificial ones. The reign of wants is by no means the reign of brotherhood. The more things a man desires for himself, the less he can do for his neighbor, and even for those attached to him by ties of blood.

The destruction of happiness, independence, moral fineness, even of the sentiment of common interests—such is the result of the reign of needs. A multitude of other unfortunate things might be added, of which not the least is the disturbance of the public welfare. When society has too great needs it is absorbed with the present, sacrifices to it the conquests of the past, immolates to it the future. After us the deluge! To raze the forests in order to get gold; to squander your patrimony in youth, destroying in a day the fruit of long years; to warm your house by burning your furniture; to burden the future with debts for the sake of present pleasure; to live by expedients and sow for the morrow trouble, sickness, ruin, envy and hate—the enumeration of all the misdeeds of this fatal regime has no end.

On the other hand, if we hold to simple needs we avoid all these evils and replace them by measureless good. That temperance and sobriety are the best guardians of health is an old story. They spare him who observes them many a misery that saddens existence. They insure him health, love of action, mental poise. Whether it be a question of food, dress or dwelling, simplicity of taste is also a source of independence and safety. The more simply you live the more secure is your future. You are less at the mercy of surprises and reverses. An illness or a period of idleness does not suffice to dispossess you; a change of position even considerable, does not put you to confusion. Having simple needs you find it less painful to accustom yourself to the hazards of fortune. You remain a man, though you lose your office or your income, because the foundation on which your life rests is not your table, your cellar, your horses, your goods and chattels or your money. In adversity you will not act like a nursling deprived of its bottle and rattle. Stronger, better armed for the struggle, presenting, like those with shaven heads, less advantage to the hands of your enemy, you will also be of more profit to your neighbor. For you will not rouse his jealousy, his base desires or his censure by your luxury, your prodigality or the spectacle of a sycophant's life, and, less absorbed in your own comfort, you will find the means of working for that of others.

SPANGLER'S PROPHECY.

1905 To Be a Year of Pestilence and Earthquakes.

Lee Spangler, the York, Pa., prophet who has attracted much attention by accurately predicting great modern events, has issued his bulletin of prophecies for the year 1905. Spangler sees dire things ahead for Russia as the result of the recent turbulency in that empire. He says in his bulletin:

"Woe unto Russia! She is fast approaching her doom. The people will overthrow the empire. The royal family and the leading members of the nobility will be murdered and subjected to worse cruelties that they have inflicted upon the Russian people. The country will be divided into small republics and elective monarchies, and these will be constantly quarreling and in a state of war until the end of the world comes in 1908.

"The big spot that has appeared upon the sun is ominous. It foretells rebellion, pestilence and nature catastrophes upon the earth. The outbreak of rebellion in Russia is but a spark. It will be fanned into a flame that will sweep over the world. The United States will not escape. The worst riots in the history of the nation are to occur this year. It will be a year of strikes in all the great industrial nations of the world. There will be much famine, much fighting and much woe.

"There will be many fires in the United States and in other civilized nations. It will be a year of great loss to the insurance companies. In Russia the revolutionists, when they become more powerful, will resort to the use of the torch. Russia's finest cities will be laid in ashes. Astronomers should watch the moon closely.

"Belief in the groundhog as a weather forecaster is a superstition that the devil has put in the minds of the people. There are thousands of such superstitions, and the devil, who is the father of ignorance, invented them. According to the groundhog's appearence, there is to be six weeks of cold weather. According to natural indications and to the revelations of God, there will be an early spring. The summer will be a dry one. Crops will be ruined by drouths. There are to be numerous earthquake shocks during the year. These will be most severe in the Old World. In Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey and New England there will be shocks of sufficient force to cause chimneys to topple over and cornices and pictures to fall."

FOR CITY COUNCIL:

DeCOURSEY E. BOLDEN.
Dr. JOHN E. LEGGE.
HENRY LAUER.

Election Monday, March 13th.

"In every community there are men who are considered as not only being law abiding themselves, but as powers in such community in maintaining the law and the order of society. A few officers here and there can do but little to protect citizens, and unless those more especially charged with the enforcement of the laws have not only the moral support of such citizens, but their active co-operation in bringing to justice violators of the law, crime will and must increase."—Judge Keedy.

ROOSEVELT.

When, on election evening, President Theodore Roosevelt, with his family gathered about, received the first message from New York that foretold a political tidal wave that had swept the country, he remarked to "The First Lady in the Land," "My dear, I am no longer an accident." If any doubt may have lingered in the mind of the Nation's chief executive as to the wonderous measure of esteem in which he is held by his countrymen, that doubt must have been dispelled by the marvelous and magnificent outpouring and ovation at the inauguration on Saturday.

President Roosevelt's aims and personality have won him an affection and influence hardly measurable by ordinary political standards. He enters office as the successful candidate of a political party, yet his extraordinary victory last November quite overran the narrow limitations of partisanship, and he begins his full term with the consciousness that in the working out of his political ideals he has behind him the practically united sentiment of the American people. He embodies more completely than any President since Lincoln the thoughts and purposes of the electorate which chose him. Popular satisfaction and popular confidence found an extraordinary expression in his election, and the same feelings find expression in the enthusiastic satisfaction with which his safe induction in office for another four years is hailed. And this, more than any outward pomp or pageant, gave true color and significance to the ceremony so successfully conducted in Washington on Saturday.

ENGINE WENT INTO RIVER.

Locomotive on the Confluence & Oakland R. R. Takes a Header.

An engine drawing a train on the Confluence & Oakland Railroad Tuesday took a header off the bridge which spans the Big Youghiogheny River one mile south of Somerfield, Pa., and was badly wrecked. No details of the accident are obtainable as to the cause. No one was injured, but traffic was delayed several hours as a result.

Card of Thanks.

On behalf of Garrett Lodge No. 113, Knights of Pythias, we desire to thank the ladies and gentlemen who so ably assisted the committee with their entertainment. We also desire to thank the public for its liberal patronage.

LARGE SHIPMENT.

One of the largest shipments that ever came to the town, in the china and dish line was received by J. M. Davis & Sons this week, consisting of nine large casks shipped direct from the factory. The goods were made to order and consist of Dinner Sets, Toilet Sets, Fancy and Plain Goods, five and ten cent lines suited to all classes of trade.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

The inaugural is over and our worthy President is no more an accident, but the determined man, acting for and in the interest of all the people who toil for a living, and are the bone and sinew of this country! As he has throttled these souless, monied monopolies and parasites of all that is vile and mean we laud and praise him, and if he stands firm President Roosevelt will go down in history as second to none but Washington. Three cheers for "Teddy."

Our two worthy carpenters, Messrs. Wm. B. Miller and Wilfred Chadderton, after taking in the maugural at Washington on Saturday, went on to the Monumental City, where they will resume work in the burned district under Contractor Walsh. They expect to be absent from home until the roses bloom. Their many friends will miss these genial friends, especially the Deer Park Cornet Band and more especially two good young wives and bright eyed little children who will longingly look and wait until papas "come marching home."

The young ladies of all the churches will give a box-supper at Town Hall on Friday, March 17th, (St. Patrick's day) at 7:30 o'clock p. m., for the laudable purpose of purchasing an organ for the M. E. Church. The old one, after 23 years' service, is of little use, and their new church should have an up-to-date instrument. All the matrons and ladies of all the churches are requested to bring boxes so as to make the festive occasion more interesting. Refreshments of the season will be served by the young ladies, both Protestant and Catholics. An offering at the door by the gentlemen of ten cents will be asked. Come and bring your lady friend, and all bachelors that do not have a sweet damsel, come and enjoy the other sweets and receive the smiles of the beautiful girls and laugh at the young gentlemen dude. This alone will be worth 10 cents; so come, Parson F and 'Squire H., not forgetting Davy "Dear", for "Gentle Annie" will be there, and greet you with her sweetest smile—more sweet than the "Rose of Sharon."

Postmaster L. D. Thrasher, after a delightful trip to Washington and spending some days with his wife and other relatives, returned home this morning and reports the inaugural grand beyond description and says he could talk a week of all the splendors—but like the Queen of Sheba, "the half could never be told". His wife preceded him some weeks and will spend some time longer in the city and will visit her cousin Mrs. M. E. Balthis, at her home in New Market, Frederick County, Md., who, as has been reported, is in a serious condition at the present time in the hospital at Frederick City.

A sleighing party of 18 ladies and gentlemen attended the revival services of the U. B. Church at Loch Lynn on Saturday night last. Another party of 12 or 15 went last night, (6th March.)

In making out pension papers on the 4th inst. at the home of our venerable friend and veteran of the Civil war, Rev. W. E. George, whom I visited owing to his feeble condition, and having been so recently bereft of one most dear; after the voucher was duly signed, in his usual clerical hand, the writer bid him good-bye, a silver quarter was dropped in his hand, and we said "I don't charge you, but will keep this as a souvenir in memory of you," thinking it might be the last time we in all probability would perform an official act for this aged ex-soldier. This grand old man of 85 years said: "I will put my stamp on this coin. I have one I bronght from England with my initials "W. E. G.", and I thought of the "Grand Old Man" of England, so recently called to his eternal home, bearing the same initials (W. E. Gladstone). But this humble Christian perhaps will not leave the great name and fame of a Gladstone. But we know he will wear a brighter crown even than his great name-sake in that land beyond the stars. We hope to ever keep this little coin, minted in the good year 1900, and preserve it as a precious souvenir.

On Feb. 28th last, a message was received from the hospitable home of our mutual friend Mr. L. Townshend Friend that his five sons wished my presence at their home on this last day of February, at 7:30 p. m., and they would come for me at 7 o'clock. On our arrival at this beautiful home one and one-half miles from Deer Park, we found an array of all the beautiful girls of our town and vicinity, who had proceeded me, and the strains of music, both vocal and instrumental, greeted our ears, and then we were reminded that on this night 21 years ago I had been invited to the wedding of this host and hostess, and that this musical demonstration was given as a surprise by these five sons, in honor of the marriage 21 years before. After a social time and listening to the violin of Messrs. Brown and Walters, the clarionet by Messrs. Thrasher and Lashorn, the guitar by Misses Florence Thrasher and Kate Brown, the organ by Miss Nellie Thrasher and Miss Browning and the beautiful Miss Nannie Rodeheaver as vocal soloist, the music was simply grand.

The next surprise was gotten up by the parents of these five manly boys. All the guests were invited to the dining room to a sumptuous feast of all the delicacies of the season. Even the oriental luxuries were lavishly displayed on snowy napkins, and all the fair young ladies were escorted to the banquet feast by the gallant young gentlemen. The invited guests numbered just 21, including the writer. The strange coincidence was, that 21 years ago, this last day of February, 1905, the weather conditions were the same, and without any previous arrangements as to invitations, there was one guest for each year of this happy couple's married life, and they live less than half mile from the groom's home. I wish them many returns of this marriage anniversary and that these five manly boys may give them many musical surprises in future days.

And now, Mr. Editor, we come to what was promised last week. Whilst we have interesting data of the services at the Baptist church organization, we find we will have to pass and leave it for another issue, as I fear your space will forbid, so we will briefly give you an interesting account of the crops raised on the famous "Altamont Spring Farm," as gleaned from the manager, Mr. W. H. Chadderton, of this productive farm.

Mr. Chadderton, after a week spent in Washington at the beautiful home of Col. Truesdell auditing accounts of the farm, he and the Colonel went to Philadelphia and purchased all the up-to-date machinery for the coming season's farming and then finding they could purchase a supply of mules at Hagerstown in our own State, they concluded that the blue grass field of the "dark and bloody grounds" of Kentucky would not be patronized for a supply of these long eared animals of toil, and the manager was instructed to purchase in Maryland, so he and Col. Truesdell both went to Hagerstown from Philadelphia and purchased at that place, this giving to the farm some five mule teams for the spring work,

The audit shows oats 35 bushels to acre and weighs 42 lbs. to the bushel; 22 tons of turnips per acre; 15 tons of cabbage per acre. On one field a yield of 2½ tons of crimson clover and a heavy crop of rape—two very heavy crops on same land the same season; 200 bushel potatoes per acre, some potatoes weighing 2½, 3½ and 4½ lbs., and they expect to increase the yield to 350 bushels the coming season by a more thorough cultivation and improvement of soil. There is no guess work about the products of this farm, as everything is weighed and a correct account of all crops raised and expenses in raising the immense yield. In a continuation account of this magnificent farm we will give the receipts and disbursements and also give you a graphic account of the manager's meanderings and royal greetings both at Hagerstown, Cumberland, and last the welcome home by finding his church flourishing with the many new acquisitions and that his only son was among the glorious number.

We expect Col. Truesdell to give us an outline of his honored experience in the inaugural parade, and as we fully realize we are now tresspassing on your space too far, we hope to continue next week, time and health permitting.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The National Casualty Co., (health and accident insurance) paid out to policy holders in this county last month the sum of $123.66 in sick benefits. Mr. E. L. Werner, of Finzell, receiving $54, and Mr. Ed. R. Mills, of Oakland, $8.

Mr. B. R. Runyan, of Everett, Pa., is visiting his brother R. J. at this place.

Mr. Samuel Lee, of Wheeling, W. Va., was a guest of Mr. and Mrs. P. T. Garthright Thursday last. On Thursday evening he went to Deer Park to visit relatives.

Mr. Ed. Smouse, of Deer Park was a business caller at this place last Thursday.

Mr. A. J. Lee unloaded a car of lime the latter part of last week.

The National Leaflet for March, organ of the National Casualty Co. has a very good picture of Mr. C. B. Cropp, of Oakland, Md., but now employed at Richwood, W. Va. It also has this paragraph:

"C. B. Cropp of Richwood, W. Va., is a better looking man than his picture would indicate. He is a night scaler in a large saw mill but finds time between his working and sleeping hours to get on the 'Hustlers' List' every month. We commend Mr. Cropp as an example of 'Where there's a will there's a way."

Mr. J. L. Echard has two teams hauling saw logs from the "Rhoages place to the saw mill at Lake Alderson.

Mr. Garrett Moon visited his aged mother, near Kearney, Saturday last.

Rev. N. Hart and wife, who have been visiting friends in West Va., returned to the Park Tuesday.

Miss Gertie Campbell returned home Tuesday, after having enjoyed a delightful visit at Washington, D. C.

Mrs. W. E. King, who has been visiting Mr. Otto Kloepfel and family, has gone to Bayard, W. Va.

The Park was represented in the great inaugural parade by H. E. Flowers, who marched with the Union League Club of Baltimore, and Wesley H. Rudisill, who marched with Co. G, 71st Va., Home Guard, and as delighted spectators, Messrs Joseph and Frank E. Rathbun.

Henry Voglepole, who has been visiting relatives in this neighborhood, has returned to Hancock.

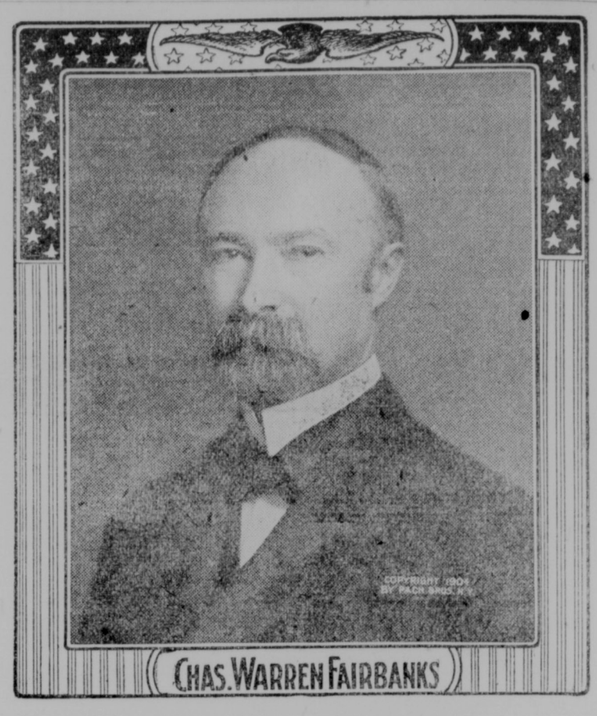
The revival meeting in the U. B. church has grown in interest the past week. Over half a hundred conversions have taken place. The effects of the meeeting are visible everywhere; you not only see but feel the influence of the meeting as you come in contact with the people in the stores, at the railroad station; in the homes the people are talking about religion. The singing is enthusiastic, the old revival hymns and tunes are sung. The preaching is plain, pointed and convincing. Good, earnest appeals are made to the unconverted. United Brethern, Methodists and Baptist are working together harmoniously. This week Revs. Faust, Baptist, and Metheny, Methodist, are co-operating with Revs. Cunningham and Johnson of the U. B. church. Rev. Metheny closed his meeting at Wesly Chapel in order to give his presence and labors to this meeting. The seekers at the altar have come from Oakland, and from the surrounding country.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. N. U. Bond, of Bond, this county, accompanied his invalid sister to St. Augustine, Florida, on last Wednesday. Miss Bond had been sick for some weeks with a low form of typhoid fever and in order to hasten convalescence her physicians suggested a change of climate. Mr. Bond will return in two weeks. His sister expects to remain until spring.

Mrs. William Tibbetts spent part of this week with relatives at Swanton.

The miners at Buxton are still idle and do not expect to resume work before the first of next week. The big shaft to replace the broken piece of machinery is expected to arrive at the mine on Thursday and work will be pushed at night and day to get it in position to start up the plant on next Monday morning. The members of the M. E. Church have commenced their preparations to make the opening day (March 19th,) of the new church a big affair.



CHAS. WARREN FAIRBANKS

Mr. Hugh Tate, of the Cumberland base ball team, surnamed "Wagon Tongue" Tate, from the size and weight of the immense bat he wields when he came to the plate and faces the pitcher, was in town on Wednesday visiting his former home.

Mr. William Klipstein, of St. Louis Mo., is visiting friends and relatives in this place and Piedmont. Some eighteen years ago Mr. Klipstein resigned his position as agent for the C. & P. R. R. Co. at Piedmont and moved to his present home and engaged in the wholesale hide and leather business. He was born and reared in Bloomington and was a grandson of old Dr. Klipstein, who is still remembered by some of the oldest settlers in this vacinity, as the only physician west of Cumberland, whose professional calls carried him over long distances and kept him away from home a week or ten days at a time.

"Billie" as he is best known to his friends and relatives has made a success of his western venture, is comfortably fixed surrounded by a family of grown up children, who are about completing their education in some of the best schools of his adopted city.

Mr. John Miller, of Illinois, arrived in town on Monday to take charge of the store at Luke recently purchased by one fellow townsman, Mr. John Miller.

Mrs. Alice Caddon, of Piedmont, youngest daughter of Mr. Andrew Miller, was a guest of her father on last Friday.

Dr. H. M. Kemp, of this place, in company with Mr. Davis, agent of the B. & O. at Piedmont, Dr. Dellinger, of Westernport, and Howard Richardson, of Piedmont, formed a quartette and took in the inauguration on last Saturday. They report plenty of fun, a good time and the biggest show on earth.

The furniture and fixtures for the new school room, which will occupy the first story of the new Junior hall arrived last week.

Carpenters are busy fixing up the interior and expect to have the room ready to turn over to the Board of School Commissioners about the first of next month. The Board of School Commissioners have leased the room for five years at $100 a year with the privilege of extending the lease to ten years if necessary. The old school house will be sold at public auction some time this spring.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER.

Mr. James White, Who Formerly Occupied the Office Announces Himself.

By reference to the first column on page four of this issue it will be noticed that Mr. James W. White, the former efficient County Treasurer, has announced himself for renomination for this office. Mr. White filled one term of two years and gave excellent satisfaction to all with whom he had dealings of a public character.

Mr. J. M. Litzinger, of Grafton, was in the city last Friday on business, returning home the same evening on train No. 1.

Mr. and Mrs. William R. Stull were at Washington last Friday and Saturday where they witnessed the inaugural ceremonies.

Mr. D. Y. Morris and grandson Byrne Thomas, of Kingwood, were the guests of relatives in Oakland last Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. Walter Ravenscraft, of Ridgway, Pa., was the guest in Oakland on Saturday and Sunday of his parents, Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Ravenscraft.

The warm rains of Tuesday night and yesterday practically cleared the pavements and streets of the several inches of ice and made walking something more than a hardship.

Mr. Will Heiser has moved his barber shop from the Hamill building on Alder street to a room in the opera house block which he has fitted up for the better accommodation of his customers.

Mr. and Mrs. D. E. Offutt and their sons D. E. and William R., were in Cumberland yesterday attending the funeral of the late Frank M. Offutt, a relative, whose death took place at his home in that city Monday morning.

Mr. W. M. Junkins, who has resided near Deer Park for a number of years where he was highly esteemed by his many friends, recently purchased the Samuel Pritts farm near Beckman, moving thereto on last Thursday.

Among those who went from here to Washington to attend the inauguration of President Roosevelt were Messrs. Joseph E. Harned, Harry J. Frear, Draper Vaughn, John J. Garrett, Thomas Skipper, Semmes Hamill and Ed. Offutt.

Mr. Andrew W. Gonder, in order to accommodate his literary inclined customers, has consolidated his two book stores and is occupying one of the rooms in the new Ravenscroft addition, having moved therein yesterday. His stock of books is large and well selected.

The season for making maple sugar has arrived and the camps are receiving attention. People do not pay the attention they formerly did to this branch of farm work, but a considerable quantity of sugar and molasses will be made this season should it prove favorable.

Warm days, with plenty of sunshine, have been the rule for the past fews days, but each night Old King Frost asserts his claim to sovereignty again and the belief that spring is nearly here gets a hard blow. The mercury falls below the freezing point by several degrees.

This is the season of the year which makes the farmer think a little along the line of good roads legislation. The highways have been in fine condition all winter on account of the snow and frozen ground, but the season of General Thaw is approaching and the bottom may be expected to drop out at any time.

As a rule, news which does not justify the use of names, especially if it be of disgraced character, is better left alone. This newspaper's rule is not to publish news like fights and minor infractions of law unless there are arrests and the matter becomes public property through the courts, and not always then, although it sometimes occurs that this rule is broken both by reference to things which do not get into court and by the omission of things which do. It is not the province of a newspaper to be a sewer for the transmission of vile and unclean things to the people.

Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Kendall, of this city, and Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Kendall, of Pittsburg, took their departure on Wednesday night on Duquesne, for Philadelphia, where the gentlemen are in attendance upon the National Meeting of Lumbermen of the United States. They will attend the large banquet that will be given at the Hotel Bellevue Stratford on Friday evening, and on Saturday morning will return to Washington, D. C., where they will witness the inauguration of President Roosevelt, and attend the inauguration ball. They will spend a few days in that city, the the guests of Mr. and Mrs. G. B. VanNess, uncle and aunt of Mrs. S. A. Kendall, who spent some time with her last summer, and became quite wellknown to many of our people.—Myersdale Republican.

A Public Invitation from J. M. Davis & Sons.

We have spent the past two months examining, contracting and buying the different lines of goods that are sold by us, visiting the factories, jobbing houses and department stores, enabling us to become fully acquainted with the latest and most improved goods that are on the market, and making such selections as we believed would be best suited to our trade.

Our new stock is now in, not only of hardware and articles classed in this line, but we have a large stock of Steel Ranges, Cook Stoves, China, Glassware, Nickelware, Woodenware, Tin and Graniteware, Paints of all kinds, Washing Machines, Sewing Machines, etc., in fact almost everything that is needed in the kitchen for the housewife, the farmer for the farm, and the carpenter in the line of tools and builder's hardware.

In order that the public may become more fully acquainted with our stock and line of goods, we have decided to open up our entire store building for one week commencing March 13th to 18th inclusive. We invite all who will be kind enough to call and examine the different lines and variety now in stock.

It will afford us great pleasure to show the goods, and quote prices, no matter whether you wish to buy or not. You will not be urged to buy, but will give you an opportunity to see and become acquainted with the leading and most up-to date goods in our lines.

You are therefore cordially invited to come, bring your friends along and examine for yourself the largest stock of the above named goods carried by any one firm in Western Maryland.

For the ladies we will offer during the week 100 doz. of 5 and 10 ct. dishes that cannot help but please any and all.

Yours,
J. M. Davis & Sons.

JUST OPENED

1000 gallons of Devoe's Lead and Zinc Paint that are strictly pure and free from all adulteration; also a complete line of stains, varnishes, oils, brushes and general supplies. If in need of anything along this line we invite you to examine our stock.

WARNING TO ORCHARDISTS.

A Letter to Fruit Growers From the State Entomologist.

The time is at hand when all progressive orchardists and those who appreciate the value of fruit in the home, should give their trees some attention. I refer more especially to those who have been menaced in retaining their orchards in a vigorous condition by the attacks of the San Jose Scale.

This notice of warning will also serve to notify those whose trees were inspected by the local inspectors under the employ of the State Horticultural Department of the Maryland Agricultural College and found to be infested with this pest. In each case the inspector tagged several trees in order to call attention of the grower to the presence of the insect in his orchard.

As a result of numerous experiments (see Md. Exp. Station Bulletin 99) conducted by this Department with various insecticides we find as yet, the lime, sulphur and salt wash (formula lime, 20 lbs., sulphur 15 lbs., salt 10 lbs., and water 50 gallons, boiled from 30 to 60 minutes) to be the most effective remedy for the pest. The wash should be applied to the trees in the spring, just before the buds begin to swell, and it is hoped that all who have this pest among their trees will give the matter their immediate attention.

It is advisable to secure reliable information as to the effectiveness of any prepared wash advertised for this before applying same.

Information as to the results of experiments with various prepared washes can be had by securing bulletin 99 of the Maryland Experiment Station.

The writer will be pleased to give further information as regards spraying and also to receive twigs of trees from any person for examination. All communications should be addressed to the State Entomologist, College Park, Md.

Truly yours,
THOMAS B. SYMONS,
State Entomologist.

CITY COUNCIL MEETING.

Water and Sewerage Franchise Asked for by Mr. Naylor Tabled.

Last night the City Council met in regular monthly session with all members of the body except Councilman Bolden, who was out of town, in attendance.

After ordering the regular monthly bills paid the question of granting a water and sewerage franchise applied for by Mr. A. D. Naylor at a previous meeting, was taken up and after the matter was thoroughly discussed from many standpoints it was laid upon the table for action by the incoming Council, the reason therefor being explained by a member of Council that the proposed source of supply (the Big Yough river) is of questionable purity and that if water should be introduced into the town it should be fit for drinking purposes as well as for fire protection. On this theory alone was action postponed. Messrs. Harned, Helbig and Ross voting for postponement and Messrs. Lawton and Dixon voting in favor of the franchise.

Officials were selected to serve at the election to be held on Monday as follows:

Judges, Messrs. Joseph M. Crim, David Durst and John W. Arnold.

Clerks, Ezekiel Merrill and John W. Maroney.

Obituary.

On Friday morning, March 3rd 1905, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. B. Ellen Stark passed peacefully over the mystic waters of death, after a beautiful Christian life extending over a period of 80 years, 10 months and 12 days. Her earthly day was long, but through its shade and shine she wrought diligently and when the evening shadows fell about her behold the sheaves were all garnered and the Master's "well done" bade her enter into the joys of her eternal reward. Weary with her day of toil she lay down to rest and angels hands bore her home to the Father's house, and love sheltereth his child till after while all shall meet her again "in that sweet by-and-by." The deceased is survived by one son and two daughters, and three step children, who mourn the loss of a faithful and loving mother, and in this sore affliction they have the sincere sympathy of scores of friends and kindred. The interment was made in the Lutheran cemetery at Bittinger on Sunday morning at eleven o'clock, after impressive services conducted by Rev. Shoup, in the presence of a large assemblage of friends and relatives.

Notice to Contractors!

Notice of Letting the Contract for a Jail and Sheriff's Residence, for Garrett County, at It's County Seat, Oakland, Md.

Sealed proposals will be received by the Clerk of the County Commissioners of Garrett County, at Oakland, Md., for the furnishing of all materials and labor required for the erection and completion of a Jail and Sheriff's Residence according to the plans and specifications prepared by Holmboe & Lafferty, Architects, Clarksburg, W. Va., copies of which are now on file at the Commissioners' Office and at the office of the above named Architects.

Said proposals will be received until 2 o'clock P. M. on the 12th Day of April, 1905,

and will be opened the same day by the County Commissioners and as soon as the said proposals have been examined the said County Commissioners will take action towards the letting of the contract.

Each proposal must be accompanied by a certified check of twenty-five per cent. of its amount, or a surety bond for a like amount made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett county as a guarantee that the successful bidder will enter into a contract and furnish a bond double the amount of his bid.

This bond must be issued by a regular Surety Guarantee Co., and furnished within a reasonable time after the contract has been signed.

The said check or bond shall become forfeited to the County Commissioners if for any reason the successful bidder shall fail to enter into a contract and furnish the bond as aforesaid after its acceptance by the said County Commissioners.

This bond must be made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett County and the conditions of the said bond shall guarantee the faithful performance and execution of the work according to the plans and specifications on file as aforesaid.

After the contract has been signed and the bond approved the certified checks will be returned to their respective makers and if the contract is not awarded within two weeks from the opening of the bids the obligation of the bidders will cease and their checks returned.

Each bidder shall accompany his bid with samples of the material he intends to use for cell construction, with a full size sample of the grating 2 inches square, and samples of plates 4 inches square, also a model or full size drawing of the locking device with detail specifications covering its construction; also each bidder must accompany his bid with samples of the cut stone.

The County Commissioners will award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder and they reserve the right to reject one or all bids.

By order of the Board,
A. G. ROSS, Clerk.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Says Weak Need Not Fear Nor Strong Presume.

FAIRBANK'S ADDRESS BRIEF.

Impressive Scene in Senate When Vice-President Took The Oath Of Office—Thousands Cheered Mr. Roosevelt's Address.

Washington, March 4.—President Roosevelt took the oath of office and delivered his inaugural address in the presence of between 30,000 and 40,000 persons at the east front of the Capitol today.

Immediately after the inauguration of the Vice President and the swearing in of the new Senators the distinguished guests marched in procession from the Senate chamber to the inaugural stand, on the east front of the Capitol.

The President was greeted with a great demonstration of applause when he made his appearance on the stand at 1.45 o'clock. Mr. Roosevelt and members of the Congressional Committee went to the rostrum, toward which all of the aisles sloped and converged. Several minutes elapsed before the oath was administered and, the wind being too brisk for Chief Justice Fuller, he motioned to his negro factotum, who stepped on the rostrum with the overcoat of the Chief Justice.

Ten thousand distinguished guests, representing Congress, the judiciary, the diplomatic corps, officials and high officers of the army and the navy and many others prominent in social life, were on the stand, which stretched from the rostrum where the President stood back to the walls of the old center portion of the building on which rests the mighty dome. The windows of the Capitol, the porticos, balconies, roof, and even projections of the dome were occupied by hundreds of persons eager for a vantage point from which to witness the impressive scene. More than 30,000 persons were massed upon the plaza of the Capitol. Towar dthe Library of Congress and far away upon the roofs of buildings several thousand feet distant a number of persons looked down upon this panorama of crowding humanity.

Between the general public and the distinguished array of jurists, statesmen, diplomats and legislators upon the stand was an imposing display of the military, including the mounted squadron and the Rough Riders and the cadets and midshipmen of West Point and Annapolis. Beyond them was an open space fringed with a cordon of mounted policemen and military officers, which held back the crowd until the President stepped to the front to deliver his address.

The oath was administered at 1 o'clock by Chief Justice Fuller, who wore his overcoat and a black velvet skull cap. The ceremony was simple, but impressive, and Mr. Roosevelt spoke the oath very deliberately and determinedly, emphasizing each word and laying special stress upon the word "Constitution."

Mr. Roosevelt then delivered his inaugural, using fewer gestures than usual and speaking slowly and deliberately. He began by turning his back on the crowd and addressing his preliminary remarks to the distinguished gathering on the stand. Turning, he walked eight feet to the balustrade and leaning over it endeavored to throw his voice across the military cordon to the people beyond. He alternated by addressing in turn those on the stand and those in the crowd: Every time he turned toward the latter throng he faced a photographic fort, which had been temporarily erected in front of the statue of Washington and from which scores of cameras, great and small, were clicked under the auspices of the illustrated journals and magazines.

Mr. Roosevelt said:

"My Fellow Citizens: No people on earth have more cause to be thankful than ours, and this is said reverently and in no spirit of boastfulness in our own strength, but with gratitude to the Giver of Good, who has blessed us with the conditions which have enabled us to achieve so large a measure of well-being and of happiness.

"To us as a people it has been granted to lay the foundations of our national life in a new continent. We are the heirs of the ages, and yet we have had to pay few of the penalties which in old countries are exacted by the dead hand of a bygone civilization. We have not been obliged to fight for our existence against any alien race, and yet our life has called for the vigor and effort without which the manlier and hardier virtues wither away.

"Under such conditions it would be our own fault if we failed, and the success which we have had in the past, the success which we confidently believe the future will bring, should cause in us no feeling of vain-glory, but rather a deep and abiding realization of all which life has offered us, a full acknowledgment of the responsibility which is ours, and a fixed determination to show that under a free government a mighty people can thrive best alike as regards the things of the body and the things of the soul.

"Much has been given to us and much will rightfully be expected from us. We have duties to others and duties to ourselves, and we can shirk neither. We have become a great nation, forced by the fact of its greatness into relations with the other nations of the earth, and we must behave as beseems a people with such responsibilities. Toward all other nations, large and small, our attitude must be one of cordial and sincere friendship. We must show not only in our words, but in our deeds, that we are earnestly desirous of securing their good will by acting toward them in a spirit of just and generous recognition of all their rights.

"But justice and generosity in a nation, as in an individual, count most when shown not by the weak, but by the strong. While ever careful to refrain from wronging others, we must be no less insistent that we are not wronged ourselves. We wish peace, but we wish the peace of justice, the peace of righteousness. We wish it because we think it is right, and not because we are afraid. No weak nation that acts manfully and justly should ever have cause to fear us, and no strong power should ever be able to single us out as a subject for insolent aggression.

"Our relations with the other powers of the world are important, but still more important are our relations among ourselves. Such growth in wealth, in population and in power as this nation has seen during the century and a quarter of its national life is inevitably accompanied by a like growth in the problems which are ever before every nation that rises to greatness. Power invariably means both responsibility and danger. Our forefathers faced certain perils which we have outgrown. We now face other perils the very existence of which it was impossible that they should foresee.

"Modern life is both complex and intense, and the tremendous changes wrought by the extraordinary industrial development of the last half century are felt in every fiber of our social and political being. Never before have men tried so vast and formidable an experipent as that of administering the affairs of a continent under the forms of a democratic republic. The conditions which have told for our marvelous material well-being, which have developed to a very high degree our energy, selfreliance and individual iniative, have also brought the care and anxiety inseparable from the accumulation of great wealth in industrial centers. Upon the success of our experiment much depends, not only as regards our own welfare, but as regards the welfare of mankind. If we fail, the cause of free self-government throughout the world will rock to its foundations; and therefore our responsibility is heavy to ourselves, to the world as it is today, and to the generations yet unborn. There is no good reason why we should fear the future, but there is every reason why we should face it seriously, neither hiding from ourselves the gravity of the problems before us nor fearing to approach these problems with the unbending, unflinching purpose to solve them aright.

"Yet, after all, though the problems are new, though the tasks set before us differ from the tasks set before our fathers who founded and preserved this Republic, the spirit in which these tasks must be undertaken and these problems faced, if our duty is to be well done, remains essentially unchanged.

"We know that self-government is difficult. We know that no people need such high traits of character as that people which seeks to govern its affairs aright through the freely expressed will of the freemen who compose it. But we have faith that we shall not prove false to the memories of the men of the mighty past. They did their work, they left us the splendid heritage we now enjoy. We in our turn have an assured confidence that we shall be able to leave this heritage unwasted and enlarged to our children and our children's children. To do so we must show, not merely in great crises, but in the everyday affairs of life, the qualities of practical intelligence, of courage, of hardihood and endurance, and above all, the power of devotion to a lofty ideal, which made great the men who founded this Republic in the days of Washington, which made great the men who preserved this Republic in the days of Abraham Lincoln."

The President arrived at the Capitol at 10.49 o'clock. He went at once to the President's room in the Senate wing, where he received Senators and signed bills for an hour. From there he was escorted by the joint inaugural committee of the Senate and House through the corridors to the main entrance of the Senate chamber. The announcement of the President's presence was made and he was escorted with the committee to vacant chairs in front of the presiding officer.

Prior to this distinguished participants in the ceremony had for two hours been assembling in the Senate chamber, and when the President took his seat he walked down an aisle, on each side of which stood members of the Supreme Court, the diplomatic corps, the Senate and House and other officials and noted men.

Mrs. Roosevelt and Mrs. Fairbanks and the members of their families occupied seats in the Senator's reserved gallery, with invited guests of the President and Vice-President-elect. In the diplomatic gallery were seated the wives, daughters and attaches of the diplomatic corps. In the other galleries were other invited guests who had been admitted by card ladies predominating, with a brilliant display of hats and gowns.

The Senate and House assembled at 10 o'clock for the closing hours of the session and by that hour the galleries were pretty well filled.

Shortly after 10 o'clock the coming of the President was informally announced. The President was slowly escorted around the northern driveway, which was fringed with people, to the main entrance of the Senate, where he was greeted by military and naval officers, the captain of the Capitol police and four subordinate officers and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, Mr. Daniel M. Ransdell. The President was followed by Senators Lodge and Spooner and Mr. Dalzell, of the Congressional Inaugural Committee; Mr. Fairbanks, who turned again and again to bow to the crowd as he left his carriage; Senator Bacon and Messrs. Crumpacker and John Sharp Williams, who were the other members of the Congressional committee; all the members of the Cabinet, Secretary Loeb and the military and naval attaches of the President. Mr. Roosevelt was escorted to the President's room. Senator Gorman left the Senate soon after the President had arrived and went to the President's room and was among the first to greet him.

With the Ptesident were members of the Cabinet and his aides and Senators Lodge and Spooner and Mr. Daizell, and these joined in the reception, in which Democrats participated as heartily as the Republicans. The first measure signed by the President was the River and Harbor bill, which carries an appropriation of $1,250,000 for Baltimore. Mr. Burton, the framer of the bill, came over from the House to pay his respects to Mr. Roosevelt. The President signed the bill without attempting to read it.

CURRENT CONSIDERATIONS OF THE CASE BEFORE THE COUNTRY.

Washington, D. C., March 4, 1905. —Uncommon interest has appeared in the people at large in the United States relating to the questions of fair play for the producers by their industries of the increase of capital, and the tendencies are for the protection of labor not organized, for discriminations for and against citizens.

The people took in hand the Presidential campaign last year, and the usual experts were largely lacking in the forces of the various influences that move the masses. First, it was evident that the President of the United States was personally strong with the people. His initiative in affairs was recognized as a feature of his courage. He actually sought work rather than leisure. He not only led the "simple," but the "strenuous" life. He led both lives, and made it strikingly evident that the two were consistent. Simplicity is an element of strength.

There was a ring in the utterances of the President that established confidence in his word. He stood for what he said, and the people knew it. When Lord Nelson signalled his fleet at the battle of Trafalgar, "England confides," which was the stronger word. The country confided in the President and the signal was right, and victory great.

The South was in a perfect position to put forth its electoral power so as to enter upon a series of strange mistakes. The racial questions were not profitable to those who aroused them by exaggeration. The South was in form to take up the campaign for the Democratic party and give it a high tone.

The fatal flaw in Hill's "game" was that neither the East nor the South knew the size or the quality of the West. The South has vast resources not fully measured by the people. If it were not for the racial entanglements and antagonisms they would be for the policy of "protection," as Henry Clay defined and championed the principle and policy.

Not only did the South give her strength to the money end of New York, but New York was absorbed in the gold plank play, which was to say that the Almighty had established the gold standard, and therefore, there were only on hand some formalities and concessions. The assurance of perfect harmony on the plat form was an announcement that there were no party policies to fight for.

William Randolph Hearst was more than a Presidential candidate. He controlled newspapers that covered the country, from Boston to San Francisco, and he and Bryan gave the country the inside truth of the convention. There has been no other newspaper and news speech torpedo firing as that at St. Louis. The files of Hearst's papers for ten days, including the convention, are important in history because there were no secrets from his representatives, and no hesitancy about publicity.

The country would have welcomed the South, full front, on principle There had been very serious consideration of committing the most fatal error possible. That was the free trade, third term Cleveland movement. But the New York moneyed men, of old and new millionaires, in time thought better of raising third termery; and the ex-President himself preferred not to bear the burdens of office and probably was not convinced of the wisdom of the managers of the Democracy of New York City.

The South has a crop of public men who are of responsibility and personal character without taint. They were carried away by the emotional rush into the arms of the New Yorkers who rallied around Hill, and he lacked in an astonishing degree to to know the West.

It was a service to journalism that was profound when the proprietor of newspapers in half a dozen States, and a candidate for the Presidency before the Democratic Convention, insisted that the people should share the secrets of the committees and the mysteries of manipulation, using the name of the Almighty as the immediate author of the gold plank. Upon this presumption all matters of moment were rated as mere forms, and the convention became representative of something that was not the manhood of the country. Perhaps Wall street statesmen would be able to guarantee to the South and West that the Almighty will establish a high protective tariff system.

Hearst and Bryan turned electric lights on the shadowed paths, and the influences and personages on New York who shouldered all responsibility and "played the game" with sharpers' style lost sight of the convictions of a majority of the Democrats of the Ohio, Upper Mississippi and Missouri valleys, the mountain States West and the Pacific coast.

The theory of the game was that the South had yielded all the power of the section to one street in New York—did it in confidence of winning, and lost. The managers did not know the people, and the strong light thrown on the convention by the independent journals, and the only Democrat who had ever received 5,500,000 votes for President was not heeded when he denounced the ignorance of the country and declared there were no remedies offered for the wrongs asserted. It was conceit and not character that ran the convention.

President Roosevelt dealt fairly with the people: made clear he was the same man who fought a hot battle and won in New York as a member of the Assembly. He won the West and received the hitherto unheard of majorities for the great office. Another such Democratic abdication in the solid South and the reorganization of the party will have to be a resurrection. Even that is not in the programme as far as declared purposes of the leaders who rush into a comatose condition of vanity and dream it is a reform to repeat blunders and aggravate them, as has appeared in the commissioners of strategy and performers of folly before Congress and the country, to the astonishment of constituencies in Mississippi and Massachusetts.

MURAT HALSTEAD.

Letter to Chas. Ashby.
Oakland.

Dear Sir: Some think we take a good deal of risk in inviting complaints of Devoe lead-and-zinc—we authorize our agent to sell it under this guarantee:

"If you have any faults to find with this paint, either now in putting it on, or hereafter in the wear, tell your dealer about it.

"We authorize him to do what is right at our expense."

The following story tells how little the risk is:

J. H. Asher & Co, hardware dealers Rhinebeck, N Y, have sold Devoe from '79 to now; have sold thousands of gallons and have had just one complaint in all this time.

Three sides of a house were perfect; the fourth was as bad as the three were good.

Explanation—It rained the night before the fourth side was painted; and the painters didn't wait for the wood to dry.

What is done in such a case? Whatever the dealer, who sold the paint, considers it fair to do. We leave it to him. He may not do exactly what we should do if we were there; but we are not there. The best we can do is to leave it to him.

Yours truly
F. W. DEVOE & CO.

THE SLAVERY OF SIN.
(Temperance Lesson)

Jesus was exceedingly skillful in the use of passing events for the illustration of truth. He seized upon them. He held them up with the hand of an adept. So when the priest came with the rejoicing processional, bearing aloft the golden urn filled with water from Siloam, in memory of the water miraculously supplied in the wilderness, and was on the point of pouring it our beside the altar, Jesus cried in strong antithesis, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me!,, So now, after they have lighted the very last of the multitudious lamps upon the golden candelabra in the treasury of the temple, a pretty illumination in memory of the pillar of fire in the wilderness, Jesus cried, "I am the Light of the world!" It is as if he had said, "These lights burn for a little while. They illuminate a limited area. Those who depend upon them will then grope in darkness. But I can illuminate the world to the end of time. I will be a fiery pillar to whoever will follow. He need not walk in darkness."

This glorious announcement fell upon ears which, hearing heard not. There was a flat refusal on the part of the national leaders to accept the claims of Jesus based, as they were, upon what they stigmatized as His unsupported testimony. To this Jesus responded that his testimony, instead of being personal and unsupported, had been repeatedly, audibly, and visibly corroborated by the Father Himself. Lofty declarations concerning His person and office and distinct intimation concerning His impending death, its nature, and by whom it should be effected, followed.

In this language of terrible severity there is one delightful interlude. It is the word of encouragement to the few who, in spite of almost universal unbelief and hate, still believed in Jesus. Their faith might be crude and erroneous; the substance of it might even be the secular hope of mere national emancipation; but if they would only continue in the atmosphere of Jesus' teaching, this immature and wrong faith might be exchanged for the genuine faith of true discipleship. Obedience will be the organ of knowledge, and knowledge of the truth will be emancipation.

The inveterate hopelessness of unbelief is illustrated in the reply of the Jews. They deprecate what they chose to esteem an imputation against the national honor. They ignore the incidents of Egypt, Syria, and Babylon, and strut as they plume themselves upon an unbroken national and personal independence. But they can not thus parry the home-thrust of the sword which proceeds from Jesus' mouth as the prophet said it would. One word reveals the slavery of which Jesus speaks. Sin is servitude. The Son of God is the sole and sufficient Emancipator from this most degrading, pitiful and deadly slavery.

Like a surgeon, with the keen scalpel of His speech, Jesus opens the very heart of the nation and shows the utter foulness of its sin and unbelief. How differently. Hebrew history would have to be written had there been confession and contrition on this fateful occasion. But the national heart was obdurate. Had He not withdrawn, Jesus' reward for His fidelity would have been a shower of deadly stones.

The Teacher's Lantern.

"He that sent Me is with Me." There is an inspiring analogy here. As Jesus was sent into the world, so is every human being. Each has a mission, a thought to express. Believing this life can never be aimless. There is no fatalism. We are not "dumb, driven cattle." Our comfort and assurance of success are that we are not deserted, but He that sent us is with us. This vital relation is maintained as long as we are faithful to the Divine ideal of our life as it is revealed to us, as Jesus was when He said, "For I do always those things that please Him."

"The servant abideth not: the Son abideth." The reference was perfectly understood by the Hebrew auditors. It is to the similiar story of Ishmeal and Isaac. Both sons of Abraham, one by the bondwoman, consequently himself a servant and destined to banishment; the other the son by the wife destined to dwell in the house forever. So all men are sons of God, and will have His Fatherly care. All are naturally in the servitude of sin, and are, like Ishmael, destined to banishment. Those sons whom the Son manumits from the servitude of sin shall be free indeed, and shall dwell in the Father's house forever.

Of all lies ever told that seems the most superlative when the Jews said to Jesus, "We never were in bondage to any man." But they think the young Rabbi so ignorant as not to know of the captivity in Egypt and Babylon? Did they think Him unacquainted with the Psalms of the exile in the Hebrew hymn-book?

This falsehood was prompted by racial pride. They said, "We be Abraham's seed, and for that reason never could be slaves." It is a striking illustration of the perversion of a good quality. Patriotic pride of ancestral origin is an admirable trait, but in this instance it was carried beyond reason and reacted harmfully.

Mosaic from Commentaries.

Had believed on Him: Had believed Him, Revised Version, not as in verse 30, meaning to accept Him as Savior, Continue in My Word, or in this doctrine of Mine: Not enough to receive truth, we must retain it. Only such are genuine disciples.—Clark. The teacher is the school.—Peloubet. Know the truth: Constant experimental knowledge of its power and efficacy.—Clark. Truth in the sense of reality: The realities of life, of the universe.—Peloubet. Truth is conformity of thought with fact; of judgment, statement, or belief with reality.—Century Dictionary. Truth shall make you free: The idea that vice is slavery is common in all literature.—Camb. Bid. Dream not of freedom while under the mastery of your desires—Plato. No one committing deeds of wickedness can be free.—Arvian. Guilt may bear the name of virtue, but it is base bondage.—Epictetus. Truth shall make you free: No man free but he who exercises himself in the meditation of the law.—Jewish Maxim. Never in bondage: False and ridiculous. Whole history a recital of servitude under Egyptians, Persians, and Romans. Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin: This the slavery of which Christ spoke; the deliverance from it the liberty He promised. Servant abideth not: Slave does not form part of the family; has no right to any part of the inheritance in the family. My Word hath no place: This doctrine of Mine has no place in you; hear but do not heed. Speak that which I have seen: unchangeable, eternal truth. Ye would do the works Abraham: Son has father's nature, naturally imitates him. If ye were Abraham's children you would imitate his faith, obedience, and uprightness.

MADE HIS WAY BACK

Dr. N. B. Scott Recalls an Instance of a Mule Returning Home.

"About three years ago I gave away a beagle hound, which was taken to Kent county. One night recently I and my family were amazed to see the dog walk into our home and take a position near the stove. It was very cold and hungry."

Anent the above paragraph in a Baltimore county paper on February 27, Dr. Norman B. Scott, of this city, says:

"In the first ten years of the last century, on my father's farm at Bruceville, then Frederick county, he had a jack mule roaming over the farm. My uncle, Upton Bruce, from Garrett county, was making him a visit. The mule was grazing in view when he said to my father, "Give me that mule; I would like to take him to Garrett with me." He replied, "Yes, take him." When he left for home he took the mule with him. This was in the fall. One morning when my father was standing on the porch in the following spring, he thought he heard a bray. He immediately sent one of the boys over to a clump of trees to where the mule used to spend much of his time and lo and behold here came the boy with the jack mule which arrived at the trees the night before from Garrett county.—Hagerstown Herald.

The Kiss In Court.

[A Kansas City judge has decided that to kiss in public is a breach of the peace.—Exchange.]

HOW sad that it should come to this,
That anarchy lurks in a kiss
Impressed in public—when it's right
If you imprint one out of sight!

Little of courts and law I know
And therefore may be voted slow,
But I am sure when kisses cease
The world's worst evils must increase.

Yet, if my inmost mind I know,
I would not kiss to make a show
And freedom's banner thus unfurl,
However beautiful the girl!

Perhaps that court held in the west
Just means "a stolen kiss is best"
And would not totally eclipse
Some recklessness in longing lips.

Or it may think it's dismal fun
To see a kiss by others won
And so adds to the law's report
Its ban on very harmless sport.
—Joel Benton in Browning's Magazine.

Proof Positive.

Simkins—My wife is a woman of remarkable strength of mind.

Timkins—Indeed!

Simkins—Yes. She never buys anything at a bargain sale that she doesn't want.

There Was Nothing to Say.

"You can tell your employer," said the obdurate collector as he took a chair in the anteroom, "that I'm going to stay right here till night if necessary."

"All right," replied the office boy, "I'll tell him."

"Well," the man who wanted money asked when the boy returned, "what did he say?"

"Nothin'. He just went over to the window to see whether the fire escape was still there."—Chicago Record-Herald.

His Point of View.

Three-year-old Harry had been seated in his high chair and was looking around with considerable wonderment in his bright eyes, taking in the exposed beams in the dining room of their new country home, which by way of "modern" decoration had been made to resemble an old English kitchen, and then he naively asked:

"Mother, are we taking breakfast in the attic?"—Lippincott's Magazine.

Useful.

Friend of the Family—It seems to me that cat is an awful bother. Your wife spends half her time letting it out the door.

Henpecked Husband—Yes, I've got that cat trained so it comes in through a hole in the cellar about as soon as it gets out. It keeps my wife so busy opening the door that she doesn't have time to worry about me.—Detroit Free Press.

Pleasant Fellow.

Miss Plane—It's very flattering, Mr. Chumpley, to have you ask me for so many dances, but what will your fiancee think?

Mr. Chumpley—Oh, she'll get mad as a hatter! That's what I'm doing it for. We've quarreled, you know.—Catholic Standard and Times.

A Poem for Today

UNSEEN SPIRITS

By Nathaniel Parker Willis

THE shadows lay along Broadway,
'Twas near the twilight-tide,
And slowly there a lady fair
Was walking in her pride.
Alone walked she; but, viewlessly,
Walked spirits at her side.

Peace charmed the street beneath her feet,
And Honor charmed the air;
And all astir looked kind on her,
And called her good as fair,
For all God ever gave to her
She kept with chary care.

She kept with care her beauties rare
From lovers warm and true,
For her heart was cold to all but gold,
And the rich came not to woo—
But honored well are charms to sell
If priests the selling do.

Now walking there was one more fair—
A slight girl, lily-pale;
And she had unseen company
To make the spirit quail;
'Twixt Want and Scorn she walked forlorn,
And nothing could avail.

No mercy now can clear her brow
For this world's peace to pray;
For, as love's wild prayer dissolved in air,
Her woman's heart gave way!—
But the sin forgiven by Christ in Heaven
By man is cursed alway!

A Poem for Today

ASK ME NO MORE

By Tennyson

ASK me no more: the moon may draw the sea;
The cloud may stoop from heaven and take the shape,
With fold to fold, of mountain or of cape;
But, O, too fond! when have I answered thee?
Ask me no more.

Ask me no more: what answer should I give?
I love not hollow cheek or faded eye;
Yet, O my friend, I will not have thee die!
Ask me no more, lest I should bid thee live;
Ask me no more.

Ask me no more; thy fate and mine are sealed;
I strove against the stream, and all in vain:
Let the great river take me to the main:
No more, dear love, for at a touch I yield;
Ask me no more.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there has come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hogs and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

ROOSEVELT INAUGURATED.

tude of bands and watched the marchers pass in parade; banners have fluttered from the roofs and festoons of bunting, giving gala-day color to the mile stretch of Pennsylvania avenue from the White House to the Capitol; the people thronged the streets along and adjacent to the line of march and cheered even when they could not see or know for what they cheered—all this the people of Washington are familiar with,—but they have never before felt the peculiar influence which gave to this inauguration the air of something new—the air of a beginning.

In the whole thing there was and indefinite sense of the symbolical. The parade was a great panorama of history, suggestive rather than real, with the figure of Roosevelt constantly on the screen. Even the decorations of the city, the stands and the general physical arrangements were in harmony with this idea. The decorations of private buildings along the avenue from the White House to the Capitol were under the direction of the committee, kept as far as possible within a single scheme of color and design, giving the impression of its having been done by one hand under the direction of a central head, instead of being guided by the haphazard freedom of individual taste. The immense bamboo posts erected about the President's reviewing stand were the standards of a new race added to our empire and symbolical of the extension of our power into the Orient. Plants from Hawaii and Porto Rico and flowers of the Philippines served in the decoration of the Pension Office for the ball. The plaster figures brought from the World's Fair and placed along the plaza in front of the White House were suggestive of expansion and growth of nationalism—an orderly bringing together of past and present with a prophecy of the future. In everything there was a suggestion of sense power associated with a pride of the rugged beginnings out of which that power is being wrought.

The picture of power and suggestion of its origin and its growth was carried out in the ride of the President to the Capitol, in his inaugural address, in the parade and in the triumphal magnificence of the ball with which the ceremonies were concluded.

For more than an hour before the President left the White House on his way to the Capitol the driveway of Pennsylvania avenue was cleared of all traffic, being kept free of street cars, vehicles and even of pedestrians. When at 10.30 o'clock, the carriage of the President and the committee of Congress whirled out from the White House attended by the picked company of Rough Riders, the New York Squadron, the Civil War veterans and the veterans of the Spanish War falling into line, Lieutenant General Chaffee and his staff, brilliant in gold braid and the flash of sabers, wheeled to the head of the column.

Down the broad avenue, stretching free from all obstruction to the view from the Treasury Building to the Capitol, this small company, with its picturesque contrast of composition, passed between two great walls of cheering spectators so densely crowded together that a cavalry charge could not have broken through the mass of people beyond the curb on either side.

This escort of the President to the Capitol was civil, with a military head, but it represented the militant spirit of our civil life in which President Roosevelt takes especial pride. Veterans of a war long since past, veterans of a war so recent that its private soldiers are still heroes and veterans of both war and plains, whose restless spirit and reckless daring endeared them to the heart of the colonel of Rough Rider, now President, represented the soldier equally in the citizen, while at the head of the column the dignity, discipline, gold lace and authority of military power were represented by the General and staff.

This ride to the Capitol was no part of the parade proper and the escort of honor was as much for safety as for dignity and display, the early appearance of the President at the Senate being for the purpose of acting on the belated bills, which, after having been passed by the two houses of Congress during the last hours of the session, would fail for lack of time for Executive examination and signature if the President were not close at hand for that purpose.

After leaving his Rough Riders at the east door of the Senate the President entered an atmosphere of dignity and formality. The ceremonies at the Capitol are conducted according to the fixed rules of etiquette, and there the President's personality was less prominent. In the Capitol the military was represented only by the presence of the highest officers of the army and navy in their full-dress uniforms, glittering in gold lace. The cowboys and Rough Riders had no place in this part of the program, and the picturesqueness of the scene was that the stately formality, the simple citizen dress of the Senators and members of the House assembled and the solemn black robes of the Supreme Court contrasting with the rich court dress of the foreign Ambassadors and Ministers and the background of gay color furnished by the dresses and flowers worn by ladies in the crowded galleries.

The same grouping of statesmen, dignified justices, brilliantly attired diplomats and handsomely dressed women which made the picture in the Senate Chamber, surrounded the President on the grandstand at the east front of the Capitol where the the oath of office was administered by Chief Justice Fuller and from which he delivered his inaugural address.

Here again stood forth the personality of Theodore Roosevelt. Before him as he spoke were the lines of military and the multitude, curious and admiring. His short and sharp manner of speech, originality of gesture and facial expression and the extreme brevity of his speech were all characteristic and struck the chord in the sensibilities of his audience which he delights to find responsive.

The sense of power, admiration of effort purpose to push forward and ever-recurrent idea of force which characterized his address were in harmony with the general spirit of the day. The characteristic of Roosevelt found expression in a single sentence:

"No weak nation that acts manfully and justly should have cause to fear us, and no strong power should ever be able to single us out as a subject for insolent aggression."

The idea that the work must be manful and just to avoid our anger and that the strong had better not presume upon their strength to affront us was reflected in the quality of this inauguration atmosphere which distinguishes it from the usual atmosphere of such ceremonies in the past.

The quality of the address was tense and throughout its delivery there was the suggestion of determination and a disposition toward the emphatic and the absolute, a realization of power without a disposition to use it unless necessary, but still a consciousness of power and an impelled determination to use it on occasions. The absence of any discussion of the details of policy seemed to imply a sweeping generalization of a forceful policy, the course of action being left to be determined by events, with confidence in his power to do whatever may seem necessary. It was as if he had said to the general public with the significance of a mutual sympathy and understanding, "Just leave it to me," and had then turned to the powers, both of foreign government and of domestic combination, and said: "I and my friends here, the people, are very friendly disposed, but you would better be a little careful what you do." The cowboys could catch this spirit of the address and give it a more accurate interpretation, perhaps, than could the diplomats who listened with bewildered intensity.

At the conclusion of his address the President rode down the avenue to the White House at the head of the most striking parade that has ever been witnessed at an inauguration. As he advanced guarded, by platoons of police and a score of detectives, and escorted by the Rough Riders and regular military, he was greeted all along the line with a tumult of cheer. A wave of sound, rising above the music of the military bands, rolled from throats of the multitude of spectators, who were banked in an immovable mass along the full extent of his line of progress and blocking each side street for the distance of a square. The cheering indicated his progress toward the White House like the rush of wind goes ahead of a storm.

Arriving at the reviewing stand after a hasty luncheon, he watched the parade go by. The military and the civil and the races over whom the American flag flies were represented in this parade. The gorgeousness of the military uniforms was eclipsed by the novelty and picturesqueness of the cowboys' careless dress and the Indian in full regalia of his race. There were the uniformed soldier, the marching organizations with their distinctive banners and dress, patriotic orders of the early Republic, citizens of our enlarged nation—Filipino, Hawaiian, Porto Rican—and the aborigines, uncivilized and civilized, whose ancestral line runs beyond the birth of American civilization. The parade represented American progress from the blanketed Indian to this period of expanded power. One hundred bands filled the air with music and a thousand gay banners were borne along the line of march.

The ceremony concluded with a night scene of great splendor. The heavens were illuminated with fireworks, 200,000 spectators being assembled at every point of vantage to view the gorgeous spectacle. Buildings were illuminated along the avenue and vicinity, and the brilliant electrical display, the gay streamers and sweeping American flags, now flowing into the glare of the light, disclosing their bright colors, and now falling back into the shadow, produced a bewildering effect of color, light and motion that made the air seem to palpitate with brilliant rainbow tints like the flaring magnificence of an aurora borealis.

The climax of splendor was reached at the inaugural ball, which the President opened at 9 o'clock. The magnificent ballroom glowed with light and the senses were almost overcome with the odor of flowers. The scene was that of a tropical garden, to which the American tropics and the Southland contributed the richest of their flora. At the sound of the bugle's salute to colors the President entered the ballroom with Mrs. Roosevelt, followed by the Vice-President and Mrs. Fairbanks, the Speaker of the House and Msss Helen Cannon, President Pro. Tem. Frye and his granddaughter, Miss White, members of the Cabinet and the Cabinet ladies, Miss Roosevelt, the military and naval attaches of the President and justices of the Supreme Court.

The 12,000 participants in the festivity, the glare of light, the dazzling beauty and color of dresses and uniform, the heavy foliage and the perfume of flowers, the rocky grotto fountain in the center of the hall and the strains of music dazzled the sense with their splendor. Here, too, with the more subtle suggestion, was detected that quality which distinctively characterized this inaugural among all others.

When this splendid scene faded away at midnight the most magnificent inaugural of this nation had had come to a close. Theodore Roosevelt returned to the White House "President in his own right," to begin a term, the power and responsibilities of which had been portrayed in the ceremony of his induction into office.

Order of Publication.

Amelia E. Poling v. Isaac James Poling. No. 1319 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett county, Maryland.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree, divorcing the plaintiff, a vinculo matrimonii, from the defendant.

The bill states that the plaintiff and defendant were married in the year 1873 and that about ten years ago the defendant abandoned and deserted the plaintiff; that the conduct of the plaintiff towards her husband has always been kind and above reproach and that the defendant abandoned the plaintiff without just cause or reason and that such abandonment has continued uninterrupted for more than ten years and is deliberate and final and the separation of the parties beyond any reasonable expectation of reconciliation; that seven children have been born to said parties as a result of said marriage, the oldest of whom is thirty-one years of age and the youngest sixteen years of age; that the plaintiff desires to resume her maiden name, Amelia Elizabeth Shirley, and that the defendant is a non-resident of the State of Maryland.

The bill then prays for a decree divorcing the plaintiff and defendant a vinculo matrimonii, that the plaintiff be permitted to resume her maiden name and for general relief and an order of publication against the absent defendant.

It is thereupon, the 31st day of January, 1905, by the Circuit Court for Garrett county, in Equity, ordered, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper, published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 4th day of March, 1905, give notice to the said absent defendant of the object and substance of this bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor on or before the 20th day of March next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

VOLUME 29. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1905. NUMBER 2

THE IMPRISONMENT OF JEFFERSON DAVIS

At Fortress Monroe and The Treatment Accorded Him By Gen. Miles.

REV. J. B. SHOUP'S TESTIMONY

Bearing Upon the Subject Given to Public Through This Medium—He Was Davis' Guard Several Months During the Incarceration.

To the Editor of The Republisan

In quite unseemly and unnecessary fashion, as I think, some pumpings applied to the aged (perhaps a bit dotaged) widow of the erstwhile leader of the defunct Confederacy, by her Savannah friend and admirers—sympathizers too with the should-be forgotten heresy—have thrust before the American public the "Fortress Monroe Imprisonment" incident once again.

The mere fact that this government should proceed to thrust the captured leader of a great rebellion against its authority into one of its prisons, should not have been treated as a world-wonder, nor raised protest either at home or abroad, but the charge of unnecessary cruelty inflicted on the person of the prisoner, this it was that started world-wide criticism.

But at the time of the occurrencies (1865-6) this charge was clearly proven untrue, and, as often repeated since, again and again denied and shown to be false. Yet now, after almost two score years, and when few surviving witnesses are left to speak, the old nastiness is once again thrust out to public view.

Fortunately Gen. Nelson A. Miles, against whom the charge lies most heavily, yet survives, and with sufficient vigor about him to give the black eye in admirable fashion to this blustering old bully of a bad cause, and, let me say, this figure is not intended to apply to Mrs. Verina Davis, daughter of a president ipse facto, and widow of a president ipse-dixit, but to the ugly old falsehood, for in all fairness it is here asserted—and I speak as an ex-commissioned officer of the 3rd Pa. Heavy Art'y, the regiment on duty during the first six months of Davis' incarceration in the fortress—that the treatment of this prisoner was as mild and considerate as would or could have been accorded a prisoner of like rank among Anglo-Saxon people in any part of the world. There was no element of cruelty about it. Harshness there was and justifiably, during the first few weeks; cruelty, none.

My attention has been called to a rediscussion of this matter in the Baltimore American within a month past, and it has been urged upon me to prepare an exhaustive magazine article, to cover the entire field and to set the matter finally at rest. Two considerations stands in the way of such an undertaking: firstly, I was not an eye witness of occurrances in the fortress between May 10 and July 1st, having been on duty with by battery in Richmond during that time; secondly, I am not a writer of magazine articles, couldn't if I would, but for four months I was on duty with the prisoner, Mr. Davis (C. C. Clay, also), almost constantly, both by day and by night, and know that during all that time Davis' treatment was not only uniformly mild but even gracious much of the time.

Distinguished people from all parts of the country and of the world had free access to him and some of the finest conversational entertainments I have ever enjoyed came to me from such interviews while the prisoner was in my care. True, I did witness a hooting or two that the boys of the regiment—those off duty and in their quarters—gave him whilst I accompanied him around his favorite walk on the ramparts of the fortress but kings and queens of other countries have had worse treatment, and besides, those hooting boys were severely punished for unsoldierly conduct. On the other hand, I more than once at his pressing invitation sat with the ex-chief to as liberal and dainty a refection from Surgeon Craven's table as the Hygeia Hotel itself could in its best days furnish to its liberal guests.

I know that Jefferson Davis' Fortress Monroe hardships bore no comparison with the hardships of the officers of the regiment which guarded him from May to November, 1865.

TAXPAYERS' MEETING SUGGESTED FOR TUESDAY NIGHT.

To Discuss a More Suitable Location For the New County Jail.

PRESENT SITE INCONVENIENT

For Everyone Having Business With County Officials---Public Buildings Should Occupy Prominent Place and Be Easily Accessible.

Ever since the determination of the Board of County Commissioners to erect a new jail for the county was announced and the declaration on the part of the board to place the jail on a lot wholly insufficient in size and at a point where it will be further removed from the business section of town and therefore inconvenient forevery one to a more or less degree, the taxpayers, not only of Oakland, but of nearly every district in the county, have expressed themselves as being dissatisfied with the proposed location, for, should the Commissioners persist in this it follows as a matter of course that the court house which must be built ere many years, will be located within easy reach of the jail and that means on the wind swept and almost inaccessible hill overlooking town where the advantages due all tax payers in a public building will be denied them unless they choose to scale the small mountain crowned by the castle to be.

Taking this view of the question that is of vital importance to the people who have business with the county officials, another thing of equal importance presents itself, touching, as it does, upon the health of the entire community, that being the proper drainage and sewerage from the jail and court house. At a recent meeting of the Town Council an ordinance was presented that body for passage, granting the county officials privilege for a term of an average life time to dump all sewerage into the Little Yough at the pumping station of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad company, located above the old mill dam on Water street. This ordinance, and rightfully, was not acted upon by the Council, the members taking the stand that to grant such would be in clear violation of the laws of health and a menace to the life and welfare of everyone residing along and in the immediate vicinity of the river. Sewerage in this direction being out of the question renders the proposed location even more undesirable than ever, and adds another palpable reason why the building should not be erected where the Commissioners intend to place it.

With the objections to the proposed site above stated and numerous other and equally tenable ones, it has been suggested by a very large number of the heaviest tax payers of the town and country that a public meeting of all the citizens of the county who may be in Oakland next Tuesday attending court that a meeting of the tax payers and citizens be held Tuesday night in the opera house and to this meeting the Commissioners, who will also be in Oakland that day, as well as the Judges of the Circuit Court and other public officials, be invited and the matter of a better and more centrally located site be thoroughly discussed. Such a meeting would relieve the Commissioners of any responsibility that may be connected with the location of the proposed building and will show to the public generally that interest is being manifested in new and better buildings for the county.

In all towns where public buildings have been erected in recent years they occupy the most prominent places within the town where they not only are easily accessible but are an ornament and in which citizens in all walks of life take an interest.

A number of sites, which will meet with the requirements for the public buildings, centrally located, and not of extraordinary cost, can be secured if the Commissioners desire to do so.

Everybody should attend the suggested meeting. It will be free to all.

A Hotel Rumor.

A rumor has been in circulation in Oakland today to the effect that Mrs. L. B. C. List, of Washington, D. C., well known in this section as the successful manager of the Loch Lynn Heights and Overlook Inn Hotels at the Park for a number of years past, has secured a lease covering a term of five years on the Oakland Hotel property owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company and would operate the house this summer after making improvements amounting to several thousand dollars in refurnishing and rehabilitating the house generally.

ORDINANCE GOVERNING BUILDINGS

To Safe Guard Business Section of Town Council Enacts Law.

At the recent meeting of the Town Council the following ordinance was passed and approved by Mayor McComas, to become effective on and after March 20th:

SEC 1. Whereas, in the opinion of the Mayor and Town Council of Oakland the erection of wooden buildings is especially dangerous to property within certain limits of said town:

SEC 2. Therefore be it enacted and ordained by the Mayor and Town Council of Oakland, That no person or persons or body corporate shall erect any frame house or building or frame addition or any improvement to any existing house or building within that portion of the Town of Oakland which lies within the following limits, namely: beginning at Geissman's Bridge on Third Street, then down Third Street to Wilson's Run, down Wilson's Run to Liberty Street, with Liberty Street to Wilson Street, down Wilson Street to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and with said railroad to the beginning, without first obtaining the consent of the said Mayor and Town Council; provided, however, that a one story back building or shed not over ten feet high shall not be considered a violation of this ordinance.

SEC. 3. And be it furtner enacted, That any person or persons or body corporate who shall violate the provisions of this ordinance or who shall neglect to conform to the provisions of the same, shall for each day he, it or they may so violate or neglect the provisions of this ordinance be fined the sum of not less than one or more than twenty five dollars and the costs of prosecution, and upon failure to pay said fine and costs shall be imprisoned in the town lockup or county jail for not more than thirty days for each offense.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

The semi-monthly session of the Orphans' Court was held in Oakland Tuesday with Judges Wilson, McMillan and Feik, and Registrar Friend present when the following business was transacted:

Letters of administration were granted William H. Jacobs upon the personal estate of the late Norman Jacobs; unto Mrs. Lillian B. Sincell and D. Y. Morris, upon the estate of Mrs. Mary E. Morris, deceased; also unto William J. Conneway upon the estate of the late Daniel Conneway.

The will of Mr. Thomas was filed for probate.

Mrs. Eva Mitchell was appointed guardian of her children.

Accident at Immersion.

Rev. Charles H. Cannon, of South Cumberland, baptized three persons in the Savage river at West Virginia Junction, near Piedmont. He wore a rubber suit. Miss Daisy Alderton, Charles Garber and Owen Boyles were he candidates. A large hole was made in the ice which had not yet gone from the river and the candidates one at a time were immersed in the ice-cold water. Ten persons, witnesses to the ceremony, crowded on the ice which suddenly gave way and all were precipitated in the water, going over their heads. Great excitement prevailed, but all were rescued, one a woman of large avoirdupois, with considerable difficulty.

REPUBLICAN MUNICIPAL TICKET WAS ELECTED

By the Voters of Oakland Last Monday by Large Majorities.

BOLDEN. LEGGE. AND LAUER

Were the Winners for Councilmanic Honors—Their Opponents Made A Good Run But Lacked Ballots—Government of Town Remains Republican.

Last Monday the annual election for three members of the Town Council took place with full tickets nominated by the Republicans and the Democrats in the field.

The Democratic nominations were made on Friday night of last week at a meeting held for that purpose in the Council chamber when Messrs. R. S. Jamison, William G. Hinebaugh and Chas. A. Deffinbaugh were placed upon the ticket. On Saturday Messrs. Jamison and Hinebaugh withdrew their names, and a committee which had been appointed Friday evening with authority to fill any vacancies which were likely to occur, substituted Messrs. Eugene Baumgartner and Daniel Vaughn for Messrs. Jamison and Hinebaugh.

The poll was held in the Council chamber and resulted in the election of D. E. Bolden, Dr. John E. Legge and Henry Lauer, the Republican nominees, by the following vote:

Bolden, 125; Legge, 110; Lauer, 110.

The vote for their opponents was: Deffinbaugh, 89; Baumgartner, 98; Vaughn, 76.

During the day good fellowship reigned among the candidates, although earnest work was indulged in by all of them in securing votes.

The newly elected officials will be sworn into office on the first Monday of April by Mayor McComas. The new Council will consist of six Republican members as it is at present constituted.

Free Seeds Exhausted.

The supply of garden seeds sent to this office by Congressman Pearre for distribution among the people of Garrett county, became exhausted on Thursday of last week, hence those applying for a portion of the same since that day cannot be accommodated. Their requests for seeds will be filed and if another consignment is received, which probably will be, their wants will then be supplied.

Slight Damage By Fire.

Tuesday about noon the roof of the Hesen building on Third street, occupied by Lee Bros. saloon caught fire from a spark emitted from the chimney and had made slight headway when discovered by the tenants. The blaze was extinguished with a bucket of water.

THE FARMER'S LOSS.

Cost Of Hauling Products Over Unimproved Roads.

"I haven't a bit of doubt that Paul Morton will make a good secretary of the navy," said a Kansas City man to a representative of the Kansas City Star recently. "No doubt he will be of great value to the government there, but if I had been president—try to imagine it—I would have used Mr. Morton for a new cabinet place. He would have been at the head of the department of roads-not railroads, but county roads, highways. That's it; he'd be secretary of highways, and the purpose of his department would be to build and maintain roadways—fine smooth highways from one end of the country to the other.

"I was riding through Kansas with him one day when he was second vice president of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe railroad. The train stopped at a tank, and we watched a farmer trying to make two fine horses drag a wagon load of wheat through mud that came to the hubs.

"There's a good example of it; said Morton. 'That man has probably driven five or six miles through soft roads to bring that wheat to market, and it is doubtful if he has considered the loss in time and money mud high ways mean to him. The people seem to take bad roads as a matter of course No man would think of thrashing wheat with a flail nowadays, but still they use seventeenth century roads—roads 200 years or more behind the rest of the farm equipment.

"That farmer back there probably lives five miles from the shipping point, and it costs him as much to haul a load of wheat to the mills as the railway company charges to haul it 200 miles to Kansas City. The time and labor given to hauling that load of wheat to market are a direct tax on the farmer and indirectly on the consumer. Good roads to market save money for farmers as directly as do improved machines.

"My idea is that labor organizations and the farmers by working together could bring results, and quick ones. The laboring man is interested on the other side—as a consumer. Besides, the workingman's products are returned to the farmer, and there is another needless tax collected by bad roads. If I were a leader of organized labor I would do what I could to have both of the great political parties declare for the use of convict labor in road building and denounce the manufacture of shoes, agricultural implements, cooperage and so on by prisoners. Building of highways is a public service, and it seems to me that it is the right direction in which to employ ablebodied people maintained at public expense.

"I am sure that the railroads would be glad indeed to carry stone and other raw material at a very low rate for road improvements. Material could be prepared in the prison, so keeping down the number of convicts who would have to be at work on the road proper. The railways appreciate what good roads mean to them. The first result would be a direct saving in time and money to the farmer, giving him a better chance to improve his land. The more the soil produces the better for the railway in that territory.

"The chief objection to farm life is the lack of society. The telephone has overcome that to some extent, but any young fellow on the farm will tell you that a telephone conversation is a poor substitute for an evening drive in a buggy. The men in the country have the buggies and surreys and horses, but they can be used only about half the time. Mud to the hubs!

"A farmer on average country roads in average weather, rain and shine, with two horses may haul two loads of sixty bushels of wheat each in a day to town, say five miles away. His time and team are worth $3 a day at least. He can get that much working on a railroad. Now, that means it costs him 2½ cents a bushel to haul that 120 bushels of wheat to market. Say he raised thirty bushels of wheat to the acre, just to be liberal, drayage alone costs him 75 cents an acre. On corn it would cost him $1. That's what you might call heavy taxes, and most of the farmers are paying it every year without realizing it.

"On a good macadamized road, laid out with respect to the topography of the country, the same team could easily haul twice as much as on a mud road. That would reduce the cost of transportation by one-half—cut down the farmer's drayage taxes from $1 an acre to 50 cents. Besides, any farm in touch with good roads would be worth $10 an acre more than the same land on a no bottom highway.

"It was all very simple, the way Morton told it," the Kansas City man continued, "and most convincing. You'd have thought he was driving a wheat wagon every day in the year. And the best of it all is that he was right."

DISCOVERY OF MARYLAND CAVE.

Found by Workmen Who Were Blasting in a Quary Near Cavetown.

A few weeks ago, while some workmen were blasting in a quarry near Cavetown, Washington county, an explosion exposed a hole in a hill through which several men passed into a large room or cave. In this cave they found some bones and Indian relics. As there was no direct entrance to the cave save that opened by the blast, it is supposed that the room was once connected with the big cave from which Cavetown takes its name but that the passageway had been closed by nature.

This discovery leads to the belief that the big cave may have many ramifications that have not yet been explored by white men.

The big cave which gave Cavetown its name is one of the natural wonders of Maryland. It is situated ten miles north of Hagerstown, at the base of South Mountain. The main room is about 150 feet wide and several hundred feet in length. The walls and ceiling are solid rock, smooth in places and elsewhere rough and rugged. Through the ages that have passed nature has embellished the cavern with beauty. Stalactites hang like pendants overhead, while stalagmites rise from either side at the base of the walls.

The uneven walls of the big room rise in places to a height of forty or fifty feet, gradually decreasing as one progresses toward the farther side, where are two openings that lead into smaller rooms. An opening in the room to the left is one of the mystifying passages in the cavern. After entering it becomes rough, and turns, and by following its course to the end one comes out into the same room about fifty feet farther on. At the far end of one of the small rooms is an opening and here one comes to a stop, owing to sudden decline down about twenty feet into another large room of almost the dimensions of the main room. Much of the same formations exist in this room but the visitor realizes that he is deeper in the earth.

Proceeding to the far side of the room, one is brought to an abrupt halt upon the edge of a large pool. Tradition lends its charm to the interest that attaches to the cave and legends entwine tales of romance and daring about it. It was in this room, and while attempting to cross the water, that a young girl is said to have disappeared many years ago and was never heard of afterwards.

Beyond the fifty feet of placid water rises a bare wall of rock, blocking further progress. The pool is formed by water that finds its way through the hill, and appears to be the same depth all the time. The water is clear as a crystal, which is accepted as evidence that there is an outlet somewhere, but has never been located It is told, but not vouched for, that chaff thrown into the pool has reappeared in a stream at Beaver Creek, at the foot of the mountain, about twenty or more miles away.

Following the other of the two large passages leading from the first room, several smaller rooms are reached. One of these is known as the "smoke-house" so called by reason of the ham-shaped formations on the ceiling. Small opening and crevices here and there in the walls, through which it is impossible to pass, indicate that the cave extends some distance beyond, but it remains for time and the result of exploration to develop what natural wonders lie hidden there.

It has been learned that the cave was occupied by the Indians when the grain-fields, orchards and vineyards now around it were a vast forest and the savage tribes held undisputed sway. Within its recess the red men smoked around their council fires, sought refuge from their enemies or rest after the chase. The walls that now echoed the tread of white generations once echoed the gutteral tones of the painted warriors and the laughter of their women and children. Though the fires have long since gone out, the ashes have been found in the bottom of the cave, together with numbers of stone implements, pieces of pottery and other relics of the days before the white men came and wrested the land from its red owners and made the wilderness blossom as the rose.

Thirty years or more ago the first discovery of Indian relics was made there. The finding of arrowheads and bones whetted the desire of the relic hunters and explorers to make deeper research, but nothing of importance was done in this direction until recently. Several years ago the finding of more relics in the cave caused the curator of the Nation Museum, in Washington, to send one of its men, Mr. J. D. McGuire who has explored caves in all parts of the country to make a thorough investigation. He employed several men and spent some time delving into the earth in the rooms of the cavern. His efforts were rewarded by a valuable find of relics, consisting of stone hatchets and pipes, arrows heads and spearheads, pieces of pottery, bones that had the appearance of being human and portions of skeletons of wild beasts including the skulls of bear, deer, etc. One of the most important discoveries made by the explorer was that of a small skeleton supposed to be an Indian child. At a depth of four or five feet in the earth was found the charred remains and ashes of fires that had evidently been made by the Indians hundreds of years ago.

During the early wars of the nation, as tradition has it, the cave was an outpost and secret meeting place of scouts, and also was frequently visited by trappers and hunters on their journeys through this section. Coming down to later days and the strife of the civil war, it is known that the cave was a hiding place for refugees from the South on their way across Mason and Dixon's line, while soldiers of both armies often found shelter there. None the less interesting in this connection is the statement made by old residents that bands of robbers that infested the region at intervals, from the early days until the law exterminated or dispersed them had their quarters in the cave. Its gloomy and inaccessible depth afforded a comparatively safe hiding place, and when strongly guarded by its desperate occupants proved a formidable stronghold.

The land in which the cave is situated is owned by Mr. George M. Bushy, a prominent resident of Cavetown, who is operating the quarries at the eastern base of the hill along the tracks of the W. M. railroad.

THRILLING EXPERIENCE.

Engine and Four Cars Plunge Into River Near Somerfield.

Passengers on the Friendsville train over the Confluence and Oakland Railroad on Tuesday of last week had some thrilling experiences when the engine drawing the train toppled over into the Yough river near Somerfield, mention of which was made in these columns last week but at that time no particulars could be learned.

From the last issue of the Uniontown Standard the following account of the accident is taken:

Jasper Augustine, who has returned from a trip to Somerset county, reports a bad wreck on the C. & O. railroad near Somerfield about 9 o'clock Tuesday morning, the engine and four cars toppling over into the Yough river, while the rear car on which were Mr. Augustine and the other passengers, remained on the track.

The train was on its way to Friendsvill and Mr. Augustine says that near Somerfield the track gave way, with the result mentioned above. The passengers had no warning of the approaching dash into the river and taken suddenly by surprise. The trainmen jumped as the train was leaving the track and escaped, though one of them got into the water up to his shoulders. The train was an accommodation and the four cars which went into the river were box cars. The engine was on its side in about eight or ten feet of water and the cars were upside down.

A wreck train was secured from Connellsville. The passenger coach was taken back to Confluence and the wreck train set to work getting the wreck out of the river and repairing the track. The trains were not able to get through to Friendsville during the day. Mr. Augustine was on his way to Selbysport, Md., and there were altogether about 12 passengers on the train.

Letter to S. L. Townshend & Son. Oakland, Md.

Dear Sirs: it's an old saying: the best advertisement is a pleased customer.

It happens to us coutinually in this way: A man buys Devoe for his house—he has painted it once in three years for a dog's-age, and thinks he knows what he wants—buys 30 gallons, and has 10 left.

He sees right-off that 20 Devoe is as much as 30 of anything else. He likes that; it comes quick; it is a surprise; and he tells of it. The best advertisement is a pleased customer.

Three years years roll round. There isn't a sign that his house needs paint; he don't paint it. This comes slow; it is a surprise; but he has got used to it. Still the best advertisement is a pleased customer.

Yours truly

A Month Without a Full Moon.

The month of February, 1866, was the most remarkable month in the world's history. January had two full moons, and so had March, but February had none. This had not occurred since the creation of the world, and, according to some astronomers, the same thing not may occur again for a period of 1,500,000 years.

For Sale—Tread Power.

Can use one, two or three horses, suitable for grinding corn on cob, sawing wood, shredding fodder, chopping hay or straw—in fact anything power may be attached to. The machine is almost new, in thorough repair and will be sold at a bargain. DEATH OF MR. G. W. KITZMILLER.

Facts Concerning His Sudden Demise Furnished by Senator Ravenscroft.

This paper is in receipt of the following letter from Senator Ravenscroft bearing upon the death of the late George Kitzmiller, which occured at Baltimore on Saturday, the 4th inst., and is published in order to correct some errors appearing in the report printed in this paper last week concerning the sad death of Mr. Kitzmiller.

Senator Ravenscroft's letter follows:

MR. BENJ. H. SINCELL,
Editor Republican.

DEAR MR. SINCELL:—Not being certain that you had received all the facts in connection with the sad death of Mr. George W. Kitzmiller, of Blaine, W. Va., I write to give you what I know.

I learned from the Baltimore Sun Monday morning of his death at the Eutaw House. I immediately put myself in touch with the clerk at that hotel, who informed me that Mr. Kitzmiller had called at his desk about 7 p. m. the evening before and asked if Mr. John W. Cross, of North Carolina, had registered. Mr. Kitzmiller, without registering himself, left the desk and made several steps in the direction of the cloak room. He suddenly became unsteady in his gait, falling against a stranger, but immediately three of the bell boys of the hotel rushed to his assistance, laying him down easily on the floor. Dr. Henry Yokum, of Beverly, W. Va., who was in the hotel, was at once called, and upon examination he pronounced life extinct. The by-standers stated that Mr. Kitzmiller never spoke, but they noticed he yawned two or three times.

I learned at the hotel that the body had been removed to the undertaking establishment of Jacob Ahrens & Company, 754 N. Eutaw Street. I called upon these gentlemen and found that under the direction an Aerie of the Eagles, through telephone communications from Cumberland, the body had been given every possible attention. It had been embalmed and was held awaiting orders as to its disposition from his home.

I came in contact with Mr. McCulloh Brown, who spent the entire day doing what he could in the way of informing his relatives at home by telegram of the sad event and doing whatever was necessary in the way of assistance in returning the remains to his home at Blaine.

A certificate to the effect that death resulted from appoplexy was given by Coroner Dr. P. Martin, of Lafayette Avenue.

In the afternoon of Monday the deceased's nephew, Mr. S. E. Eastburn, a B. & O. ticket agent at Washington, D. C., whose residence is at Rockville, Md., came to Baltimore and took charge of the remains. Mr. Brown and myself accompanied Mr. Eastburn to Camden Station with the remains, where he left on No. 3 train 11 p. m., March 6th.

I give you the above facts thinking they may be of some assistance to you in giving an account of Mr. Kitzmiller's death.

Very truly yours,
R. A. RAVENSCROFT.

Mr. Kitzmiller's funeral took place from his late home at Blaine on Wednesday of last week being one of the largest ever witnessed in the West Virginia Central territory. The ceremonies were under the auspices of Cumberland Aerie, No. 245, Fraternal Order of Eagles, of which he was a member. The services were conducted by Rev. William J. Williams, rector of the Episcopal church, Western port, Md., who is worthy president of the Piedmont Aerie. He acted as chaplain in the services of the Eagles. Harry T. Mullin, of Cumberland, filling the office of the worthy president, and Robert P. Casey, of Cumberland, past worthy president. Mr. George C. Frey, funeral director of Cumberland, who is a member of Cumberland Aerie, looked after the details of the funeral on behalf of the Eagles.

Rev. Mr. Williams delivered the eulogy, his remarks making a profound impression. He is a gifted speaker.

The pallbearers were Messrs. Orestes Tibbetts, S. B. Brydon, J. B. Bantz, Patrick W. Donahue, Thomas A. Smith, John W. George, G. A. Porter and D. J. Moran.

"Jesus, Lover of My Soul," and "Nearer My God to Thee," were the hymns sung in the Eagle's service.

Other members of the Eagles present besides those already mentioned were Thurman G. Lyons, John W. George, John J. Humbird and Charles B. Ferguson.

While the funeral was being conducted Mrs. Kitzmiller received a telegram announcing the serious illness of her father, Mr. Jacob Richards, at Deepwater, Va.

After the burial of her husband, Mrs. Kitzmiller arranged to leave at once for her father's bedside.

Healing Of The Man Born Blind.

To the thirty-three parables the thirty-three miracles of Jesus may well be added; for the latter were, in fact, parables, too—deeds packed with an inexhaustible symbolism. . . . The uplifted stones, the glaring faces of those who thirsted for His blood, has just forcibly reminded Jesus of the rapid approach of the night of death, in which He must cease from these symbolic deeds. He will crowd the few remaining hours full of them. . . . Among the lazzaroni crowding the approach to the temple stands the well-known beggar blind from birth. Pfenninger, with the instinct of a poet imagines a discussion among the apostles as they halt in passing: "Judas began, 'His parents must have heavily sinned.' Thomas replied 'Or God foresaw great sin in him.' John adds, 'I know not what to think thereon.' Peter finally breaks out, 'Master, tell us who.' " . . . The words of Jesus may have fallen upon the ears of the unfortunate man, all the more alert because the other sense was lost. Those words may have been the seeds of that faith which was so soon to shake like Lebanon. "Neither this man nor his parents!"

. . . What joy to be rid of the odious imputation cast at him from childhood, that his phenomenal suffering must be penalty of phenomenal sin! "Now, that he is in this sad and humanly speaking, remediless plight, he furnishes a rare subject for My Divine power, I will make him a new, indubitable, and lustrous seal upon My claim to Messiahship.". . . It pleased the Master to condescend to the use of the crude materia medica of the day in order to strengthen the growing faith of the unfortunate man, and to make the cure the more conspicuous. Across the city he goes, holding the poultices of clay to his sightless eyes, followed by an ever-increasing crowd of curiosity-mongers, some of whom, no doubt, gibe at his credulity. He went; he washed; he saw. As the clay lozenges dropped, Siloam's mirrored surface reflected for him the beetling crags of the temple crowned mount, and over all the azure dome. . . . What wonder that his very neighbors doubted the identity of the man upon whose expressionless face the light of the soul was now pouring through his opened eyes! The man himself has passed into a new world, but has no doubt about his being the same man who once cried on the temple steps, "Pity one born blind!" Nor has he a shadow of doubt as to who wrought his cure. Mayhap some hired and overalert emissary of the Sanhedrin hales him before that august body. It was, for them, the most unfortunate "catch" they ever made. The man deposes like a self-possessed witness. He rests the irresistible lever of his logic upon an indisputable fact, and bears down upon it with the vigor of true manliness. Behold you, the ancient, vaunted, colossal superstructure of an effete ecclesiasticism topples to its fall! There is a wild scurrying to its rescue. . . . The attempt is made to terrorize the man's parents into the lie that his blindness was not congenital. Their very timidity enhances the value of their testimony. The man himself is now recalled, and, as if in his absence a foul plot had been discovered to foist Jesus upon the nation by means of a fictitious miracle, he is adjured by all the pains and penalties at discretion of the Sanhedrin to deny the validity of his cure. . . . Like a pillar of Hercules this humble man stands while the highest court of his nation frets itself into a foam of rage against him. He is overborne at length, and swept contemptuously out like so much filth and offscouring. But he is quickly found of Jesus and ensconsced in that Church against which the gates of hell shall ne'er prevail.

The Teacher's Lantern.

I picked up an autograph-album in the home of my friend, Professor Sultzberger, in Frankfort-on-the-Main, and, opening it at random my eye fell on the, to me, familiar handwriting of the first Methodist bishop to make the circuit of the globe. The sentiment was one never to be forgotten: "The question is not so much how sin got into the world as how to get sin out of the world.—C. Kingsley." . . . Jesus steers His disciples away from a subject that is purely speculative in character. He attempts no theodicy. He simply affirms that in this instance, though the parties were not sinless persons, the uncommon suffering was not due to an unusual degree of sin in them. But Providence would avail Himself of this instance of phenomenal affliction to show the Divine power that was in Christ. . . . An eccentric thought which Victor Hugo somewhere weaves into one of his fictions is this—the normal condition of our world is one of darkness, only relieved by the intrusion upon it of the illuminating orb. What may be mere conceit as regards the material world, is a fact in the moral sphere. The utter obstinate darkness of men's minds to the things of God is only relieved by Him who said, "I am the Light of the world." . . . Professor Tyndall can trace the subtle metamorphoses of sunlight in its manifestations in organic and inorganic, vital and physical power. In every fire that burns and every flame that glows, he sees a dispensing of light and heat which originally belonged to the sun. Yet, when it comes to believing that the moral darkness of the human soul can be irradiated, and its weakness stored with higher potencies, he hesitates, he denies. The miracles of sunlight to one so competent to define and see them, ought to make belief in the miracles of moral illumination comparatively easy. . . . John's glowing narrative gives us a dissolving view, fascinating and impressive. The pitiful mendicant fades away, and in his stead appears a glorious confessor, witty, dauntless, meet to be enrolled in the noble army of the faithful, if we but knew his name. . . . Converts shouldn't be coddled. The healed man was left to his own resources to fight it out with the august assembly to suffer extreme ecclesiastical penalty, all with no word of comfort. Thus he endured hardness. And it was good for him. . . . Excommunication put the mark of moral leprosy on the Jew. If he died, there was no mourning for him. If he lived no one could come nearer to him than four cubits. His social and religious privations were of direst sort. But all this was as dust of balance compared with denying the reality of his cure, or the worth of the Prophet who had effected it. Converts of to-day may well imitate such an example. . . . The glad acceptance of Jesus by the beggar, his stubborn rejection by the chiefs of the nation, has its modern analogue. Jesus is set for the fall or rising of many. He is still a savor of life unto life, or of death unto death.

Mosaic from Commentaries.

A man blind: Blindness is common in Palestine to a degree which we in Western lands can scarcely realize. There is probably no country in the world, except Egypt, where this affliction is so prevalent. At Gaza, for instance, it is said that one-third of the population in that city, I should unhesitatingly say that the statement is not exaggerated.—Tristram. Who did sin: The connection between sin and suffering was an elementary principle with the Jews. Its application to the lives of individuals without evidence of special sin is condemned by our Lord. In this instance the question was complicated by the fact that the man had been born blind, forming an ethical of theological puzzle such as the rabbis were fond of discussing. Two alternative solutions presented themselves—either that the calamity was due to the sin of the man's parents on a principle of transmission or that it was sin committed by the man himself. In the latter case it might be either punishment by anticipation or for sin committed in a previous state of existence. But probably the disciples were speaking generally, and had no precise conception of the various possibilities involved in the first part of their question.—New Century Bible. Go wash in Siloam . . . which is sent: As the prescribed action was purely symbolical in its design, so in connection with it the evangelical notices the symbolical name of the pool, as in this case bearing testimony to Him who was sent to do what it only symbolized.—J. F. B.

Big Coal Washer

W. A. Liller, of Keyser, W. Va., has just closed a contract with the Oakland Coal & Coke Co., of Corinth, W. Va., for the erection of a large coal washer dimensions of which are 50x100 at foundation and 74ft high and will require about 200,000 ft of lumber, also a great deal of iron work and other materials in erecting same. The plant will be equipped with the most up to date machinery and when completed will be one of the most modern plants of its kind. Mr. S. H. Jordan, of Keyser, is superintendent of this Coal Company. Mr. Liller expects to begin work on this structure in a short time with a large force of workmen and his Superintendent H. P. Rotruck, will have charge of the work.

"What Fur?"

SNUB NOSED, red haired, freckled lad;
Never had no chance er had
What y' might call schoolin' fust
Raised among th' ornriest,
Always seemed t' want t' know
Jest why things was thus an' so
Look up in y'r face an' say,
In th' most inquirin' way,
"What fur?"

Always tinkerin' around
Railroad shops an' always found
Somethin' there t' ask about;
Always findin' somethin' out.
Never saw a chain er shaft,
Belt er pulley but he'd haft
T look up in his curi's way—
Look up in y'r face an' say,
"What fur?"

Wasn't satisfied t' know
That th' wheels went thus an' so;
Nothin' 'd ever satisfy
Him ontil he found out why.
Never saw a thing but he
Followed right t' A B C.
When he saw a wheel go round
Never give up till he found
"What fur."

Got a place—how, I can't say—
In th' railroad shops one day;
Always kep' his busy eye
Peeled an' always askin' why.
When a hole was bored—well, he
Would look down an' presently
Look up at some one an' say
In his own inquirin' way,
"What fur?"

Well, sir, next thing that I hear
He'd rigged up a h'istin' gear
All his own, discovered by
His eternal askin' why.
Got a patent fur it, then
Wuth a mint o' money. When
We told him we s'posed he'd quit,
He jest says an' smiled a bit,
"What fur?"

Money jest come rollin' in
Faster 'n ever waves o' sin
Beat on earth. He didn't care;
Jest kep' cool an' stayed right there
'Side of us an', when we 'lowed
He'd forget th' common crowd,
Looked up, jest as when a child,
When he said an' sort o' smiled,
"What fur?"

Pardon, stranger; that 'ere tear
I've dropped on this castin' here
Is fur him. We liked him so;
Never proud a bit, y' know.
Typhoid, so the doctor said;
Don't perfess t' be well read
Er t' understand, but we
Nary one of us could see
"What fur."

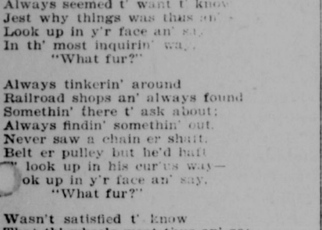
A Telephonic Danger.



Paterfamilias (who has just rung up the call office and has his attention diverted by his little daughter)—Hello, dear, coming to kiss me good night?

Voice of Female Telephone Clerk (severely)—I beg your pardon!

His Reasons.

"No, I haven't got along very well in life," says our friend the dentist. "You see, I have seven children, and the expense of raising them is something great. Then business hasn't increased as I expected it would."

"Too many mouths to fill," we commiserate.

"Yes, and not enough teeth to fill," he adds.—Judge.

A Compliment.

"Did you ever have an editor say anything flattering to you?" asked the poet's friend.

"Yes. The editor of the Diurnal did once," replied the poet.

"Why, they don't pay for poetry."

"That's just what he said to me, intimating that my stuff was poetry."—Philadelphia Ledger.

His Ambition.

"Why don't you try to make a name that will be respected by future generations?"

"My dear sir," answered Mr. Dustin Stax, "my vanity does not go so far. I am content to make a fortune that is respected by the present generation."—Washington Star.

Preferred the Cash.

"My husband trusts you, doctor, implicitly."

"That's very kind of your husband, madam, but I'm not quite so sure that I can implicitly trust him."—Boston Herald.

Good Idea.

"They say Miss Highstepper is going to marry an army officer."

"Well, I should think that a man who makes a business of war might be able to get along with her."—Detroit Free Press.

A Symptom.

Mrs. Ascum—What makes you think your husband is seriously ill? He doesn't complain, does he?

Mrs. Wise—No; that's why I think he must be sick.—Baltimore News.

His Receptive Capacity.

"He has a wonderfully receptive mind."

"Yes, I understand he made $100,000 in a year once as a receiver."—Chicago Record-Herald.

The Objection.

Dumley—I suppose she didn't like my making sheep's eyes at her, eh?

Synnex—She didn't like your using sheep's eyes as much as you did.—Boston Transcript.

The Education of the Child

By LORENZO D. HARVEY, Superintendent of Schools, Menomonee, Wis.

THE education of the child has for its purpose his development through environment largely, but through environment AS SHAPED AND MOLDED BY THE DEMANDS OF SOCIETY. In a large measure education is a MODIFICATION of environment, and this modification is brought about by influences external to the child being educated. Our entire school system is a modification of the NATURAL environment of the child, coming not solely or even largely from a study of his activities, but from the experience and judgment of society as to his future needs as a member of that society. Keeping in mind that for which the child is to be prepared, not in any given industry, BUT AS A USEFUL MEMBER OF SOCIETY, as fixing the aim and what he is prepared for NOW, as determining what is to be done today of the things which are essential to be done for the working out of the aim of education, it follows that, if the industries are to find a place in the training of the child, then his present activities at any stage do not furnish a proper basis for the determination of what industries are to be employed, but WHAT shall be employed NOW, and HOW they shall be employed.

THE DIFFERENT SUBJECTS WHICH FIND A PLACE IN THE ELEMENTARY COURSE OF STUDY ARE THERE BECAUSE OF THEIR NEED IN THE PROPER DEVELOPMENT OF THE CHILD FOR THE ACTIVITIES OF LIFE. WHETHER ANY SUBJECT SHALL FIND A PLACE IN THE ELEMENTARY COURSE OF EDUCATION OR NOT IS DETERMINED BY ITS UTILITY VALUE AND ITS TRAINING VALUE.

The Physically Unsound Should Not Marry

By IAN MACLAREN, Author of "The Bonnie Brier Bush," Etc.

NO PERSON WHO IS NOT ABSOLUTELY SOUND SHOULD BE PERMITTED TO MARRY.

I do not mean that a merely delicate person should not marry, because many such people are CONSTITUTIONALLY sound and quite entitled to marry, provided they are, in an insurance sense, first class lives. The reason I recommend a man before marrying to obtain the certificate of a good insurance company is because in that way he gets the benefit of an UNPREJUDICED and independent examination.

Insurance companies don't examine merely for the man's own benefit, but for the protection of THEIR FUNDS. A certificate of health given after a severe and unbiased test would justify marriage.

I HOPE THE TIME WILL COME WHEN THE STATE WILL NOT SANCTION MARRIAGE UNLESS MEN AND WOMEN CAN QUALIFY FOR SUCH A HEALTH CERTIFICATE.

I am not alluding merely to physique IN AN ATHLETIC SENSE when speaking of APPARENTLY healthy people, but to physical AND MENTAL soundness in the strictest medical sense. You may see at any time men six feet high, with broad and well built chests, walking about the streets who are nevertheless unsound from an insurance point of view and therefore from a MARRIAGEABLE standpoint.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there has come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hogs and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

THE PRESIDENT'S CABINET.

It is not often one administration succeeds another with so little change in the president's official family as marks the end of President Roosevelt's accidental term and the beginning of the term which may be called properly his own.

When the late Postmaster General Payne died, Assistant Postmaster General Wynne took charge of the office and agreed to hold it until March 4, when George C. Cortelyou was scheduled to become the head of the post-office department.

With this single change, the cabinet remains as it was before the election last fall. It is easy for the average citizens to forget the names of the cabinet officers, and we suspect that if the question were put to history classes in schools there would be a liberal precentage of wrong answers given. By way of refreshing memories along this line it might be well enough to give herewith the names of those who compose President Roosevelt's cabinet at the beginning of his present term:

Secretary of State—John Hay, District of Columbia.

Secretary of the Treasury—Leslie M. Shaw, Iowa.

Secretary of War—William H. Taft, Ohio.

Attorney General—William H. Moody, Massachusetts.

Postmaster General—George B. Cortelyou, New York.

Secretary of the Navy—Paul Morton, Illinois.

Secretary of the Interior—Ethan A. Hitchcock, Missouri.

Secretary of Agriculture—James Wilson, Iowa.

Secretary of Commerce and Labor—Victor H. Metcalf, California.

It is said that Secretary Shaw has agreed to remain in the cabinet only the present year, after which he expects to re-engage in business. The man who is capable of filling a cabinet place usually does so at a financial sacrifice, since he is capable of conducting business operations that would net him more than the $8,000 a year which is the salary of a cabinet officer.

EMPEROR WILLIAM, of Germany, has made the novel proposition to President Roosevelt of an exchange of college professors of the two countries. His idea is the adoption of a workable plan by which American professors may be releived from their regular duties for a period of six months, more or less, and spend the time in giving a number of lectures in each of the prominent universities of Germany. German professors to be given similar time for lectures in American universities. Ambassador Tower, now on his way home, will present the President an outline of the scheme. It is the Emperor's belief that great benefit will be derived by students of one country from hearing a discussion of the literature, language, economic and social affairs of the other by a professor of that country.

THE RIGHT RING.

The inaugural address of Gov. W. M. O. Dawson of West Virginia, has the right ring. Mr. Dawson's sympathes are with the common people and he believes in the doctrine of the square deal. Hence he was bitterly fought by the corporations in the campaign last fall, and their work was shown in the returns, the Roosevelt plurality of 32,000 in that state being cut down to less than 10,000 for Dawson. Gov. Dawson is in a position to be free and unfettered from undue corporate influence, and his inaugural indicates his purpose to see that the people's rights shall be protected from invasions from this source. He says:

"Among the most important legislation needed in West Virginia is a law to protect the state against unjust freight charges and unjust discrimination by the railroads, and the creation of a railroad commission. We ought all to hold up the hands of President Roosevelt in his courageous effort to bring about the enactment of proper laws upon this subject, and at the same time we should see that the men who represent us in our state legislature vote for public interests and not for private interests."

That is in West Virginia, and in every other state in the Union. The public rights must be preserved, and those who, as individuals or corporations, use the franchises and privileges that have been given to them, to oppress the people, must be made to feel that sovereignty is still in the people, and that there must be fair and equitable dealing.

THE Fairmont Times refers to what it calls the able representation of Marion county in the W. Va. legislature, whereby three assemblymen and one senator succeeded in having three bills passed, two of which were vetoed by Gov. White. The Times sets up a false standard of measurement in this matter. The usefulness of a legislator in these days of graft and jobbing consists not alone in his ability to have laws passed but also in his watchfulness and courage in defeating bills that ought not to pass. Most modern legislative bodies enact too many laws—that is, too many of the questionable sort.

THE Highway Division of the Maryland Geological Survey is rushing to work on the preparation of plans and estimates for the State Highways, and as soon as spring opens and the roads become firm enough for engineering operations, will bend every effort to complete field work so that construction on at least one road in every county applying may be begun as soon as the weather permits of construction.

At the end of the season's work Maryland will have in every part of the State, except Garrett county, one or two pieces of well constructed road which next winter and spring will be samples of what is to come when Maryland has completed this scheme for the improvement of her highways.

BRYAN ON ROOSEVELT

In an editorial in the latest issue of the Commoner, the title of which is "Theodore Roosevelt," Mr. Bryan continues his snuggling up to the President with a graceful ardor that Tom Watson cannot excel, gifted as he is in that particular variety of rhetorical eloquence which is best adapted to snuggling-up purposes. We have not space for reproduction of the entire article, but this sample paragraph will show the drift and pith of of it:

"The Commoner has had occasion to commend Mr. Roosevelt is several particulars, and now that he has been inaugurated to serve during the term for which he was elected, it expresses the sincere hope that it may have many opportunities for giving its approval of his efforts. Men of all political parties are striving for the same end—good government. The rank and file of parties may differ as to the methods to be employyd in obtaining that end. Some of them may for a time be deceived and kept in ignorance concerning the real purpose of their leaders, but sooner or later men moving with a common purpose will mass themselves against a common enemy, and sooner or later popular government, in the best sense of the term will be restored. Then men who have thriven and grown fat through special interests will be required to remove shackles they have placed upon the limbs of the people."

In the main, that is about correct—mainly, patriotic thought expressed in good English. But a person inclined to be critical might remind Mr. Bryan that the Constitution of the United States does not provide for "popular government in the best"—or in any other—"sense of the term." On the contrary, the Constitution makes unalterable provision against "popular government," a provision that cannot be abrogated without dissolving the Union and taking a new start. The House of Representatives is the only branch of our government whose members are elected by the people. We never haye had "popular government;" therefore it is a mistake to say that, under any possible conditions, it "will be restored."

An Editor's Wants.

What the editor wants is the news, and we want you to help in the matter. If your wife knocks you down with the poker, let us know and we will make it right with the public. If you have company tell us if you are not ashamed of your visitor. If a youngster calls at your house begging for raiment, buy a box of cigars and come round, and we will find a suitable name for him or her as circumstances will suggest. And if you have a social gathering of a few of your friends bring around a big cake, seven or eight pies and a ham—not necessarily to eat, but as a guarantee of good faith. You can do a great deal for us this way and by so doing make the news better than it is.—Exchange.

MARYLAND DAY REQUIRED BY LAW

Must Be Observed in the Public Schools on Friday March. 24.

Maryland Day is required by the new school law to be observed in the schools on March 24, with a suitable program. The following suggestive program has been recommended by the State Board of Education:

Song—"Maryland, My Maryland,"

Purpose of Maryland Day and Meaning of Religious Toleration—By the teacher.

Poem—"The Settlement of Maryland"—By a Fourth Grade pupil.

Essay—"Religious Toleration in Maryland"—By a Seventh Grade pupil.

Song (to be selected)—By the school.

Poem—"Maryland," by a fifth Grade pubil.

Reading—"Act Concerning Religion—By a Sixth Grade Pupil.

A Character Sketch of Celcilius Calvert—By a High School pupil.

Address—"Conditions Favoring Toleration in Early Maryland"—By a patron.

Collection for Statue of Cecilius Calvert, Lord Baltimore.

Song—"The Star Spangled Banner,—By the school.

In addition to the aforgoing program the School Board recommends that some competent person residing in the vicinity be secured to give a talk on Maryland history.

BLOOMINGTON.

By virtue of his being the oldest local Methodist minister in the West Baltimore Conference, the only living trustee of the first M. E. church of this place, a pillar and strong defender of the faith, honored, beloved and respected by all wherever known, Rev. H. H. Kight, of Piedmont, has been selected to preach the sermon in the new M. E. church on next Sunday morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. John Murphy, of Dry Run, has been quite sick during the past week.

Born, unto Mr. and Mrs. James Jones, on last Saturday afternoon, a bright and interesting little boy.

Sheriff Frantz was in town on Monday extendiug invitations to a number of our citizens to attend the proceedings of the Circuit Court at Oakland, commencing next Monday morning.

Mr. J. W. Virts, of Seldom Seen, moved to Barnum on last Monday.

In company with her sister, Miss Katie, Miss Helen Swann returned home from Washington, D. C., on Saturday.

The new casting to replace the broken pieces of machinery at the Buxton mine arrived on last Tuesday evening and by Wednesday morning was ready for operation. The miners after being idle for the past two weeks or more had assembled at the mouth of the mine ready for the first trip in, to get to their work. The rope haulage machinery was set in motion and had only made about two revolutions when one of the huge steel spindles belonging to one of the large wheels broke off near the rim, causing another suspension of work until the repairs are made. Of course the miners are a little blue over their bad luck as orders were coming in fast and the prospects for good steady spring work were never better.

One of our oldest citizens is now leaving this country for the country's good. While this bereavement was unexpected, it will not be deplored. If he never comes back we won't think him long gone, nor will he be forgotten, having left a token of remembrance with some of our prominent citizens. To avoid any unpleasantness his household effects were shipped out of this state in another man's name.

Miss Emma Ridgley, of Ridgley, W. Va., who has been a guest for the past week of Mr. and Mrs. John Raley and Mrs. Raley's mother Mrs. Fannie Bartlett, returned home on Wednesday morning.

Miss Pearl Tompson is the lady clerk in George Warnick's grocery store.

Mr. David Lauer, a well known farmer of near Deer Park, was in town on business Wednesday.

Diphtheria is reported as prevalent at Bond, this district. One death and several new cases reported last week.

Mr. Jefferson Green, of Bittinger, this county, enroute to Barton to visit a sick son, spent Monday with his friend, Mr. Charles Fazenbaker, of Savage, and the day following with friends in this community.

Mr. Augustus Barnard, who had been visiting relatives in the Chestnut Grove settlement, was in town Saturday on his way home.

Dr. Boynton of Barnum, who went to Washington to view the inauguration and spent a few days with his mother, returned to his practice on last Saturday evening.

Mrs. Bert Price and little daughter, of Blaine, were the guests, last week of her husband's parents, Mr. and Mrs. William Price.

STEEL RANGE.

Your special attention is called to steel range as advertised by J. M. Davis & Sons.

BITTINGER.

Just a faint and tender whisper, from a blue bird over there,
Mingled with a robin's chirping where the meadow knoll is bare.
Spring is near.
Just a dim and distance murmur from the brooklet in the dell,
While the choristers of neture each the tidings sweetly tell,
Syring if near,

With the prospect of spring's speedy advent the busy farmers are occupied this week in opening their sugar camps, to be in readiness for the first flow of sap from which large quantities of delicious sweets are manufactured annually in this section.

News reached here last week of the death of Mr. Elias Brenneman, who was a native of this district, but who has resided in the west for the past twenty years. His death was due to cancer and dropsy. The deceased was a brother of C. J., Samuel and Daniel J. Brenneman, all well known gentlemen in this county.

Mr. J. L. Beachy who with his family passed the winter at the Beachy mine on Cherry Creek, moved to their home near here last week.

Mr. Christian Shrank moved from this place to his farm last Monday.

Mr. Luther Ralston, who has been employed in the lumber regions of West Virginia for some months, came home last week to assist his brother Charles in their camp during the sugar season.

Rev. Shoup left here Monday afternoon for the Meadow Mountain appointment, where he will conduct a series of meeting during the week.

Jonas Bittinger has been confined to his home for some days.

Messrs. Chas. Sechler and Albert Brenneman purchased two fine milch cows, from Joel Deal, a Cove farmer, last week.

We have been told that J. B. Harmon has sold his farm near this place for a consideration of $7000, the purchaser being from Petersburg, Pa.

The local mine operators have suspended operations for the winter.

For New B. & O. Cut-Off.

It is given out at Morgantown by most excellent authority that the contract for the Cameron-Confluence cut-off of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad will be let on March 15. As to that part of it between Confluence, Pa., and Pisgah, W. Va., a rush order has been given the engineers here to get the section between Pisgah and Morgantown ready for contracting in 60 days, and six corps of engineers have gone to work on the section.

The Pennsylvania is surveying a line up Cheat river in the eastern section of the county, and the Wabash is grading in the western part of the county, while the Lake Erie is contemplating a line up the Monongahela river on the west side of the river, thus making this county a center of great activity in railroad building.—Morgantown Post.

"SAVED MY LIFE"

—That's what a prominent druggist said of Scott's Emulsion a short time ago. As a rule we don't use or refer to testimonials in addressing the public, but the above remark and similar expressions are made so often in connection with Scott's Emulsion that they are worthy of occasional note. From infancy to old age Scott's Emulsion offers a reliable means of remedying improper and weak development, restoring lost flesh and vitality, and repairing waste. The action of Scott's Emulsion is no more of a secret than the composition of the Emulsion itself. What it does it does through nourishment—the kind of nourishment that cannot be obtained in ordinary food. No system is too weak or delicate to retain Scott's Emulsion and gather good from it.

We will send you a sample free.

Be sure that this picture in the form of a label is on the wrapper of every bottle of Emulsion you buy.

Bender, five of the progressive farmers and stockmen of Grantsville District, attended the sale of fine live stock near Hagerstown on the 7th inst where they purchased a number of the animals, shipping them to their respective farms.

Mr. Miller purchased a Shropshire ram for $29. This animal won the first prize at the Hagerstown fair last year.

Mr. H. S. Yoder, at private sale, purchased a Durham cow for $100, the animal having won the first prize for three successive years at the Hagerstown fair. He also purchased a Durham heifer for $100.

Mr. S. M. Yoder purchased a ewe for $27.50, while Mr. C. W. Bender bought two ewes at $15 per head

All the animals bought by the Garrett countians are registered stock and were among the finest sold at the sale when more than a hundred head of sheep, horses, hogs and cattle were auctioned off.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mr. Jackson Runyan and brother R. G., are working at Corinth. They spent the Sabbath at the Park.

Mr. Nolan, a Baptist of Baltimore, spent part of last week at this place.

Mr. Warren Choate, of Washington, D. C., spent last Frinay at this place. Mr. C. owns Hotel Chautauqua.

Mrs. Richard Roy after spending an enjoyable time visiting relatives in this vicinity returned to her home at Altamont a few days ago.

Mr. Robt. Kitzmiller, of Rowlesburg, W. Va., is a guest of Mr. and Mrs. B. Bosley, of near the Park.

Mr. J. L. Rotheruck has moved out of the Enlow house into a house on D street. Mr. P. B. Gough last Friday moved into the Bowman house on L street. Mrs. L. J. P. Squires will move, in a week or two from "Heartsease Cottage" to one of Mr. Jamison's houses on H street.

Mrs. R. Hamilton, of Pittsburg, Pa., for the past several summers a Park resident, departed this life a few weeks ago at home.

Mr. R. G. Richardson, who conducts the "Home Furniture Bazaar" at this place during the season, has sold his store and building at Piedmont. He expects to occupy their Park home early in May.

Mr. C. F. Dawson has ordered the paper to paper the Jamison house on the corner of Oakland avenue and H street.

Mr. and Mrs. Faust spent Monday last in Cumberland.

Miss Daisy Sweitzer, of Swanton, visited friends in this neighborhood last week.

Rev. N. Hart has rented the Pennsylvania Home on E street and will upon it in June for boarders.

Mr. Levi Echard of this place, is confined to his home by a heavy cold.

The first maple syrup and sugar of 1905 was brought to this market by Mr. S. D. Harvey of near Kearney.

Mr. Geo. W. Harvey, of near Kearney, spent Tuesday last with his brother C. V. Harvey of this place.

Mrs. W. S. Paugh, of Cumberland, is visiting the family of Mr. James Paugh, south of the Park.

There is a rumor that Mrs. L. B. C. List will have charge of the Loch Lynn Hotel next season.

Mr. Lawrence Crane, after an enjoyable visit with his parents, returned to Fairmont on No. 3 Monday.

Rev. Metheny Sabbath evening last preached in the Methodist church of this place a thoughtful, helpful and easily understood sermon. One feels better and more like doing hieyduty after hearing him preach.

Wm. Clair, of Corinth, visited his parents at this place Saturday and Sunday last.

M. L. Selby, in charge of a squad of painters on the B. & O., and son, spent the Sabbath at Loch Lynn with the family.

The revival at the U. B. church daily increases in interest. The oldest inhabitant does not remember such an interest in religion as is now manifested in this neighborhood. During the past week there were a number of conversions. The business houses closes at seven o'clock. The meeting shows the result of faithful work in the Sunday school, and co-operation of all christians in revival work. There have been seventy-eight conversions. Of this number, thirty-seven have united with the United Brethern church.

Mrs. S. O. Sawyer, of the Assembly House, returned to the Park Tuesdey evening after spending several months at Cameron, W. Va.

Merchant Garthright unloaded a car of feed yesterday.

Kenny More and wife went to Hancock, Md., yesterday, where they expect to remain several months.

Merchant Garthright shipped 213 dozen eggs last week.

MAY BE REAPPOINTED.

Senator Ravenscroft Will Likely Succeed Himself in Office.

A recent issue of the Baltimore American, in which was discussed at some length the Federal appointments to be made next year by President Roosevelt, contained the following relative to Senator Ravenscroft of this county, who now holds the office of Surveyor of the Port at Baltimore:

"It is too early to say what will be the trend of events leading up to the filling of the federal offices in Maryland, including the surveyor of the port, the naval officer, internal revenue collector, subtreasurer, United States marshal and special appraiser of It is certain that Mr. Pearre will make a fight for the reappointment of Dr. Ravenscroft as surveyor of the port. This fight may lead Mr. Pearre to join forces with his Republican collagues in the House from Maryland and present to the President a list of appointments agreeable to them all.

Hoyes Grange.

A meeting of the Hoyes Grange was held at Gap Run Friday evening, March 3, 1905. The meeting was well attended, considering the amount of sickness existing among the members. Several points of business were attended to, after which the meeting adjourned until called again at some future date.

SUNDAY SCHOOL RALLY.

In St. Paul's M. E. Church Next Thursday Afternoon and Night.

Rev. A. P. George, D. D., field worker for the Sunday School Union of the Methodist Episcopal church, will be in Oakland next Thursday afternoon and evening and will give a "Chalk Talk" at four o'clock p. m. This will be especially interesting to children and Sunday school teachers and all are invited to avail themselves of this opportunity to witness a practical demonstration of this method.

In the evening at 7.30 o'clock Dr. George will make a public address in the interest of Sunday school work.

The speaker comes to us highly recommended as a platform speaker and Sunday school specialist.

We invite the general public to both these services, assuring them that it is a rare opportunity to hear one of our official representatives without expense.

J. B. WORKMAN, Pastor.

Dr. Webster Ravenscroft, of Accident, has had posters printed at this office advertising at puplic sale on Friday, March 31st, at his home in Accident, all of his personal property and real estate, the latter consisting of 34 acres of excellent farm land with first-class improvements. Dr. Ravenscroft contemplates locating near Oakland if sale is made of his property as advertised. He will be heartily welcomed by the people of Oakland and vicinity.

A parent is not under obligation to start his children in life with a fortune, but he is under obligation from every point of view to give them as fast as he may be able the means of fitting themselves for the duties of mature life, and there is no such means comparable to that of good education. When the Government gives to the children the opportunity of acquiring such an education, surely the parent has no right to deprive his children of it.

Capt. R. R. Sanner, former principal of the public schools of Oakland and afterwards of Friendsville, has been appointed military instructor at the Jumonville Orphans' School in Cumberland to succeed Major Barnett, who was dismissed some time ago. Capt. Sanner, who is at present teaching at Uniontown, will enter upon his new duties in about two weeks.

Slates are fast disappearing from schools all over the country. In many States the health boards have made regulations forbidding the use of slates in the schools, declaring them unsanitary. No more spitting on slates and then wiping them off with their sleeves for the boys of this generations. No more sponges to throw at each other. All the pleasures of our boyhood seems to be denied to the child of today, who must content himself with paper. Paper tablets are replacing the slates, and last year in the United States about $10,000,000 worth of paper tablets at retail prices were sold. This would make about 160,000,000 tablets.

If anybody has the left hind leg of a rabbit caught in the graveyard in the dark of the moon by a red-haired colored man he ought to send it to B. Zitzman. He is the victim of a hoodoo. Recently he was found lying almost frozen to death in the snow near his home; later when he recovered sufficiently to leave his bed his night clothing took fire from a gas stove and he was badly burned before the flames could be extinguished, and only a few days ago as he was descending from the haymow in his stable he slipped and fell, and in his rapid flight downward a ring which he wore on the fourth finger of his left hand caught on a nail and the flesh was literally stripped from the bone.—Barnerville Republican.

Rev. J. B. Shoup, of Bittinger, this county, who, during the War of the Rebellion, was a member of the 3rd Pa. Heavy Artillery, and after the capture of Jefferson Davis, as a commissioned officer of his Battery, had charge of the Southern chief, while he was incarcerated in Fortress Monroe, gives in this issue of THE REPUBLICAN some hitherto unwritten history bearing on the controversy which has been going on for some months between Gen. Miles, who commanded the troops at Fortress Monroe at the time, and Mrs. Davis, widow of the President of the Confederacy. Mr. Shoup's thorough knowledge of happenings and events transpiring within the walls of the Fort at the time made their indelible impress upon his mind and being known to many as a fluent and accurate writer he has been asked to prepare a magazine article with reference to the treatment of Mr. Davis during his detention as a prisoner, but has declined to do so and gives to our readers something of more than ordinary interest. The article is well worthy of preserving.

As a Reward for Hard Work Among Strangers.

Miss Love Warnick received from her uncle the sum of one thousand dollars in one dollar gold pieces on Tuesday last for her bravery and hard work among strangers during the year 1904. Miss Warnick is a highly respected lady of Garrett county, and also one among the leading milliners of that section. She will leave here the 12th of April for the state of Georgia, where she will complete her business. Her many friends are sorry to learn of her departure.—Cumberland Times.

False Arrest Alleged.

John Early Wood, Jr., a minor, son of Col. John E. Wood, by Lawyer William Colton, brought suit in the Superior Court at Baltimore Saturday against the United Railways and Electric Company asking $10,000 damages for alleged false arrest and prosecution. He says that on March 8 last, while riding in one of the defendant Company's cars, he was abused by the conductor and arrested and charged with disturbing the peace on the car. The charge was subsequently dismissed by justice Packard at the Eastern Police Station.

Notice to Contractors!

Notice of Letting the Contract for a Jail and Sheriff's Residence, for Garrett County, at It's County Seat, Oakland, Md.

Sealed proposals will be received by the Clerk of the County Commissioners of Garrett County, at Oakland, Md., for the furnishing of all materials and labor required for the erection and completion of a Jail and Sheriff's Residence according to the plans and specifications prepared by Holmboe & Lafferty, Architects, Clarksburg, W. Va., copies of which are now on file at the Commissioners' Office and at the office of the above named Architects.

Said proposals will be received until 2 o'clock P. M. on the 12th Day of April, 1905,

and will be opened the same day by the County Commissioners and as soon as the said proposals have been examined the said County Commissioners will take action towards the letting of the contract.

Each proposal must be accompanied by a certified check of twenty-five per cent. of its amount, or a surety bond for a like amount made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett county as a guarantee that the successful bidder will enter into a contract and furnish a bond double the amount of his bid.

This bond must be issued by a regular Surety Guarantee Co., and furnished within a reasonable time after the contract has been signed.

The said check or bond shall become forfeited to the County Commissioners if for any reason the successful bidder shall fail to enter into a contract and furnish the bond as aforesaid after its acceptance by the said County Commissioners.

This bond must be made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett County and the conditions of the said bond shall guarantee the faithful performance and execution of the work according to the plans and specifications on file as aforesaid.

After the contract has been signed and the bond approved the certified checks will be returned to their respective makers and if the contract is not awarded within two weeks from the opening of the bids the obligation of the bidders will cease and their checks returned.

Each bidder shall accompany his bid with samples of the material he intends to use for cell construction, with a full size sample of the grating 2 inches square, and samples of plates 4 inches square, also a model or full size drawing of the locking device with detail specifications covering its construction; also each bidder must accompany his bid with samples of the cut stone.

The County Commissioners will award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder and they reserve the right to reject one or all bids.

By order of the Board.

Unloading The Golden Galleon

By..... WILLIS EMERY

Copyright, 1904, by Charles B. Etherington

HARLAND was a man of many enterprises, and his office was the lair of mysteries. His bank accounts were surprisingly, even suspiciously, numerous, and they were overdrawn every afternoon and made good every morning. He patched them up chiefly with notes which in the privacy of his sanctum he was accustomed to speak of as "wall paper," yet none of them went to protest. When not paid in full at maturity they were renewed in a perfectly regular and businesslike manner, and as the whirl of Harland's affairs became wider his credit miraculously improved.

Whenever I called at his office I wondered whether I should find him a bankrupt or a millionaire; but, upon the whole, I regarded him as steadily drifting toward sensational ruin. It was a pleasure to talk with him because he had so many worries which he bore so well. He was the only man of my acquaintance whose pecuniary affairs were worse tangled than my own, and, though his debts were greater than mine in the proportion of $10 to a penny, there was a certain similarity in our situations.

One day Harland said to me, "I've got some gold mines"—

"Gold mines!" said I.

"Certainly. They're in the Yellow creek region of New Mexico. Here's a map of the claims."

He pulled the map out of the litter that always incumbered his desk and laid it before me. It was printed in several colors, and I saw the name "Golden Galleon" in black letters upon an assemblage of yellow parallelograms on the right hand side. I judged that the parallelograms were the separate claims that made up the Golden Galleon mine.

"I've seen this Golden Galleon stock advertised for sale," said I; "but, of course, I didn't know that you were the bunko steerer behind it."

Harland was frowning at the map.

"This is the old one," he said and pulled out another from a drawer. The Golden Galleon in this revised presentation had moved to the exact center of the picture, and there were startling alterations in the adjacent territory.

"If you can write us a slashing good prospectus," said he, "we'll pay real money for it. These clippings of our advertising will show you the line of talk that we like, and if you need any more facts"—

"Any more what?"

"Facts," said he impressively. "If you need any more facts, Mr. Adams, our superintendent will give them to you. He happens to be in town at this time."

I went to see Mr. Adams, who was as pleasant a liar as ever I had met with up to that time. He had a bright, breezy style and an air of sincerity that were hard to resist. Against all reason, judgment and experience I began to believe in this mine, but the impression faded as soon as I turned my back upon Adams. That evening in my humble boarding house I had much trouble in persuading myself to take up the task of writing the prospectus. I have enough conscience to make me uncomfortable, but not nearly enough to make me virtuous.

"WE'LL PAY REAL MONEY."

The prospectus was finished on the third day, and by that time I was far beyond the pale of moral obligations. The whirl of imagination and literary effort inside my head and the grinding pressure of pecuniary troubles from without had reduced my whole fabric of conscious existence to an aching pulp, and the necessity for haste had been like an enormous spoon stirring the aforesaid pulp more and more frantically. Harland was in a hurry for the prospectus; I was in a hurry for his money in order that I might pass it to various people who were in the worst hurry of all. So when I took the copy to Harland's office I talked aloud to myself in the street car and pounded my legs with my clinched fists whenever there was a stop.

Harland liked the prospectus. He said that it was a ripping good story, and Adams heartily agreed with him. They were especially pleased with certain flights of fancy evolved by me in moments of torture more acute than the average. For instance, I had described a belt made of twenty dollar gold pieces around the slender waist of a beautiful girl, and then I had stated that the amount of yellow metal actually known to exist in the Golden Galleon mine would make a belt of that kind large enough to encircle the moon.

"How does that figure out?" asked Adams doubtfully.

"Nobody will bother to calculate it," said Harland. "Let it stand. The women will like it."

I shuddered. It had not occurred to me before that women might be led to risk their money on the Golden Galleon. My imagination had pictured men with little, restless eyes and sloping foreheads drawn toward this lure of gold as rats are drawn toward a trap, more than half aware of the peril, yet unable to resist the promptings of their own greediness and the fragrance of the bait. The typical male investor is barely worthy of sympathy, but to women the passion for gold may be forgiven because they spend it with such delight upon the things which they believe to be beautiful.

I was recalled from such thoughts by the voice of Harland saying: "Pass me that check book, Adams, like a good fellow. No, not that one—the third from the bottom of the pile. That account is overdrawn only about a couple of thousand, so a little thing like this won't matter."

And he drew me a check for a hundred and fifty. My existence could have been preserved another day for half that sum, and I was speechless with gratitude. Moreover, Harland told me where I could get the check cashed, though it was then after banking hours.

My landlady was sitting on the stoop when I returned home after dining at a club with Harland and Adams. The lady in question is past fifty and has begun to feel the infirmities of age. She carries too much weight and is laden with many cares, mostly pecuniary, if one may judge from her conversation.

"How are you this evening, Mrs. Von Glahn?" said I cheerily.

"I never felt better nor had less," she replied, with a sigh. And then to show me that this remark had no application to my account with her, which had been piling up for two or three weeks, she gave me a very friendly glance.

Mrs. Von Glahn was a German by birth, but she had been in America long enough to speak the language almost like a native except when she was in a hurry. She was a woman of a generous heart and had done enough in unobtrusive charity to insure her a rich reward hereafter unless all our faith is vain. But in the visible affairs of her daily life she exercised an amusing parsimony. When her husband carved a steak for dinner she measured every piece with her eye and suffered great distress if he erred in the direction of liberality. The instant that the last person was "helped" the remainder of the steak vanished. A trained servant removed it with the celerity of a conjurer.

Mrs. Von Glahn worried about money, but I never regarded her as grasping or miserly.

"I have some money for you, Mrs. Von Glahn," said I, proudly displaying the fruits of my honest toil for Harland.

"Oh, me, oh, my!" said she, with an affectionate glance at the money. "Where did you find so much?"

"I dug it out of a gold mine," I replied.

"A gold mine!" she echoed, with a sigh. "I wish I had one. You own a part of it, eh?"

"No," said I. "I've been writing a little book for the owners. They are selling some of the stock in order to develop the property."

With that instinct which makes a woman shop when she does not wish to buy, Mrs. Von Glahn asked me about the price of this stock. I explained to her that the par value was a dollar a share and that the present price was 25 cents. Then, because my mind was loaded with the subject, I told some wild tales about the advance in the value of shares of other mines located close beside the Golden Galleon and working in ore which the best experts pronounced to be indistinguishable from that of the wonderfully rich deposits of the G. G.

In due time my prospectus was printed, and a very pretty little book it made, with a Spanish galleon on the cover. The vessel was in red gold on a dark green sea lighted by a pale gold moon. Harland was so pleased with it that he gave me another job and paid me liberally, throwing in a small block of the stock for good measure. I laughed at the gift of the stock, but Harland said, "You just wait!" in a tone that startled me.

About a fortnight later I was waiting for Harland in his office when a member of his staff approached me and asked if I had any Golden Galleon stock. I answered in the affirmative. The man put his forefinger into my waistcoat pocket.

"Spout your watch," said he, "and buy some more."

I was about to request an explanation when Harland entered hurriedly, as he always did, and the whirlwind accompanying his progress carried me along into his private room.

"Look at this," said he and laid before me a brief report from Adams, who was then at the mine. It was accompanied by figures of assays.

"Harland," said I after examining these documents, "is this story straight?"

"Straight as a string," he replied. And I knew that he was telling the truth.

"I want some stock."

"You can't have it at the old price, my son," said he, with a chuckle; "not today."

"Oh, yes, I can," I rejoined. "That price is open to me up to noon tomorrow."

Harland liked a bluff, and I knew it. He laughed.

"For how much stock?" he asked.

"Ten thousand shares," said I at a venture.

He hesitated a moment and then said, "It goes."

Ten thousand shares at 25 cents call for $2,500, and I couldn't raise a fifth of that sum. I had not spoken for myself alone, however. I had been thinking of good old Mrs. Von Glahn and her pitiful worries. Here was a chance to free her mind from care and give her peace for the remainder of her days. It was a perfect certainty that an investment in Golden Galleon shares at 25 cents would result in quadrupling one's money, for the stock would certainly go to par immediately upon the announcement of the new discoveries at the mines. Why should not this honest and kindly woman reap some share of profit from my present opportunity?

She was sitting in her accustomed place on the stoop when I reached the house, and my heart sank when I perceived that she was reading from a little volume bound in dark green with a picture of a golden ship upon the cover.

"WALL PAPER," SAID HARLAND.

The obvious falsity and exaggeration of that prospectus must be clear to any sane mind, as it seemed to me.

"Is it true," said Mrs. Von Glahn dreamily as I approached—"is it true what you say here about those twenty dollar gold pieces reaching round the moon?"

I groaned.

"Don't you care what I've written in that book," said I. "Attend, if you please, to what I shall tell you now."

Mrs. Von Glahn attended, and the result was that I bought 8,000 shares of Golden Galleon stock for her before noon next day. Within a week from that date she could have sold the stock at par, and within a month there were bona fide sales as high as $3 per share. Unprejudiced persons familiar with such matters told me that the stock would go to $10 before the 1st of September. I had made my landlady's fortune.

Alas, we rarely know what is good for us or for others in this perplexing world! Instead of accomplishing the end which I had sought the result was precisely contrary. So far from conferring the blessing of peace upon my landlady, I had driven her almost to distraction. She could not sit still in a chair. She could not eat her dinner, but would sit with half shut eyes making calculations upon the tablecloth with the handle of a coffee spoon. She neglected her work and her personal comfort that she might sit on the stoop, even on rainy days, fretting for my return that I might tell her news of the Golden Galleon.

At last, to my inexpressible relief, her demeanor changed. She became calm. Whether some chance word of mine had accomplished this result or the lapse of days had brought an adjustment of her own powers of mental resistance I could not determine, nor did I give much thought to it.

My mind grew so easy about her that I ceased to visit Harland's office daily, and my reports to Mrs. Von Glahn were often imaginary. But one day I thought best to get a little authentic information.

"Where have you been?" demanded Harland when I entered his private room.

"Why—why"— I stammered in surprise.

"Why in blazes haven't you looked in?" said he. "I'd have put you on. But it's too late now."

"Too late?"

"Yep," said he. "We've unloaded. You see, there was a crowd trying to get control of the Golden Galleon, and they've been bidding up the stock. They thought they were buying from small holders, but really they've been getting mine and the holdings of other insiders through dummies that we fixed up for them. Now we're out of it, and they're stuck."

"Stuck!"

"Yes. The vein's pinched out. All gone."

"And the stock?"

"Wall paper," said Harland.

Mrs. Von Glahn was sitting placidly on the stoop when I came home.

"Well," said she cheerily, "how about the gold mine stock?"

I clung to the stone railing, as pale as a ghost.

"Busted, eh?" said she. "Gone up?"

"I'll make it good to you."

"Oh, neffer mind me," said she. "I sell him. Dr. Dahlen said I kill myself mit worry, so I sell out—to him on his advice. Don't you tell him I tolt you."

"The rascal!" I exclaimed. "He thought he was cheating you."

"Is it so?" she said, folding her hands serenely. "Well, I make pretty good. I sell him for $3 a share."

The Simple Life

CHAPTER VII.

SIMPLE PLEASURES.

DO you find life amusing in these days? For my part, on the whole, it seems rather depressing, and I fear that my opinion is not altogether personal. As I observe the lives of my contemporaries and listen to their talk I find myself unhappily confirmed in the opinion that they do not get much pleasure out of things. And certainly it is not from lack of trying. But it must be acknowledged that their success is meager. Where can the fault be?

Some accuse politics or business, others social problems or militarism. We meet only an embarrassment of choice when we start to unstring the chaplet of our carking cares. Suppose we set out in pursuit of pleasure. There is too much pepper in our soup to make it palatable. Our arms are filled with a multitude of embarrassments, any one of which would be enough to spoil our temper. From morning till night, wherever we go the people we meet are hurried, worried, preoccupied. Some have spilt their good blood in the miserable conflicts of petty politics; others are disheartened by the meanness and jealousy they have encountered in the world of literature or art. Commercial competition troubles the sleep of not a few. The crowded curricula of study and the exigencies of their opening careers spoil life for young men. The working classes suffer the consequences of a ceaseless struggle. It is becoming disagreeable to govern because authority is diminishing; to teach, because respect is vanishing. Wherever one turns there is matter for discontent.

And yet history shows us certain epochs of upheaval which were as lacking in idyllic tranquillity as is our own, but which the gravest events did not prevent from being gay. It even seems as if the seriousness of affairs, the uncertainty of the morrow, the violence of social convulsions, sometimes became a new source of vitality. It is not a rare thing to hear soldiers singing between two battles, and I think myself nowise mistaken in saying that human joy has celebrated its finest triumphs under the greatest tests of endurance. But to sleep peacefully on the eve of battle, or to exult at the stake, men had then the stimulus of an internal harmony which we perhaps lack. Joy is not in things; it is in us, and I hold to the belief that the causes of our present unrest, of this contagious discontent spreading everywhere, are in us at least as much as in exterior conditions.

To give oneself up heartily to diversion one must feel himself on a solid basis, must believe in life and find it within him. And here lies our weakness. So many of us—even, alas, the younger men—are at variance with life, and I do not speak of philosophers only. How do you think a man can be amused while he has his doubts whether, after all, life is worth living? Besides this, one observes a disquieting depression of vital force, which must be attributed to the abuse man makes of his sensations. Excess of all kinds has blurred our senses and poisoned our faculty for happiness. Human nature succumbs under the irregularities imposed upon it. Deeply attainted at its root, the desire to live, persistent in spite of everything, seeks satisfaction in cheats and baubles. In medical science we have recourse to artificial respiration, artificial alimentation and galvanism. So, too, around expiring pleasure we see a crowd of its votaries exerting themselves to reawaken it, to reanimate it. Most ingenious means have been invented; it can never be said that expense has been spared. Everything has been tried, the possible and the impossible. But in all these complicated alembics no one has ever arrived at distilling a drop of veritable joy. We must not confound pleasure with the instruments of pleasure. To be a painter, does it suffice to arm oneself with a brush, or does the purchase at great cost of a Stradivarius make one a musician? No more, if you had the whole paraphernalia of amusement in the perfection of its ingenuity, would it advance you upon your road. But with a bit of crayon a great artist makes an immortal sketch. It needs talent or genius to paint; and to amuse oneself, the faculty of being happy—whoever possesses it is amused at slight cost. This faculty is destroyed by skepticism, artificial living, overabuse; it is fostered by confidence, moderation and normal habits of thought and action.

An excellent proof of my proposition, and one very easily encountered, lies in the fact that wherever life is simple and sane true pleasure accompanies it as fragrance does uncultivated flowers. Be this life hard, hampered, devoid of all things ordinarily considered as the very conditions of pleasure, the rare and delicate plant, joy, flourishes there. It springs up between the flags of the pavement, on an arid wall, in the fissure of a rock. We ask ourselves how it comes and whence, but it lives, while in the soft warmth of conservatories or in fields richly fertilized you cultivate it at a golden cost to see it fade and die in your hand.

Ask actors what audience is happiest at the play. They will tell you the popular one. The reason is not hard to grasp. To these people the play is an exception. They are not bored by it from overindulgence. And, too, to them it is a rest from rude toil. The pleasure they enjoy they have honestly earned, and they know its cost as they know that of each sou earned by the sweat of their labor. More, they have not frequented the wings, they have no intrigues with the actresses, they do not see the wires pulled. To them it is all real. And so they feel pleasure unalloyed. I think I see the sated skeptic, whose monocle glistens in that box, cast a disdainful glance over the smiling crowd.

Poor stupid creatures, ignorant and gross.

And yet they are the true livers, while he is an artificial product, a manikin, incapable of experiencing this fine and salutary intoxication of an hour of frank pleasure.

Unhappily, ingenuousness is disappearing even in the rural districts. We see the people of our cities and those of the country in their turn breaking with the good traditions. The mind warped by alcohol, by the passion for gambling and by unhealthy literature, contracts little by little perverted tastes. Artificial life makes irruption into communities once simple in their pleasures, and it is like phylloxera to the vine. The robust tree of rustic joy finds its sap drained, its leaves turning yellow.

Compare a fete champetre of the good old style with the village festivals, so called, of today. In the one case, in the honored setting of antique costumes, genuine countrymen sing the folk songs, dance rustic dances, regale themselves with native drinks and seem entirely in their element. They take their pleasure as the blacksmith forges, as the cascade tumbles over the rocks, as the colts frisk in the meadows. It is contagious; it stirs your heart. In spite of yourself you are ready to cry: "Bravo, my children! That is fine!" You want to join in. In the other case you see villagers disguised as city folk, countrywomen made hideous by the modiste, and, as the chief ornament of the festival, a lot of degenerates who bawl the songs of music halls, and sometimes in the place of honor a group of tenth rate barn stormers, imported for the occasion, to civilize these rustics and give them a taste of refined pleasures. For drinks, liquors mixed with brandy or absinth—in the whole thing neither originality nor picturesqueness. License, indeed, and clownishness, but not that abandon which ingenuous joy brings in its train.

This question of pleasure is capital. Staid people generally neglect it as a frivolity; utilitarians, as a costly superfluity. Those whom we designate as pleasure seekers forage in this delicate domain like wild boars in a garden. No one seems to doubt the immense human interest attached to joy. It is a sacred flame that must be fed and that throws a splendid radiance over life. He who takes pains to foster it accomplishes a work as profitable for humanity as he who builds bridges, pierces tunnels or cultivates the ground. So to order one's life as to keep, amid toils and suffering, the faculty of happiness and be able to propagate it in a sort of salutary contagion among one's fellow men is to do a work of fraternity in the noblest sense. To give a trifling pleasure, smooth an anxious brow, bring a little light into dark paths—what a truly divine office in the midst of this poor humanity! But it is only in great simplicity of heart that one succeeds in filling it.

We are not simple enough to be happy and to render others so. We lack the singleness of heart and the self forgetfulness. We spread joy, as we do consolation, by such methods as to obtain negative results. To console a person what do we do? We set to work to dispute his suffering, persuade him that he is mistaken in thinking himself unhappy. In reality our language translated into truthful speech would amount to this: "You suffer, my friend? That is strange. You must be mistaken, for I feel nothing." As the only human means of soothing grief is to share it in the heart, how must a sufferer feel consoled in this fashion?

To divert our neighbor, make him pass an agreeable hour, we set out in the same way. We invite him to admire our versatility, to laugh at our wit, to frequent our house, to sit at our table. Through it all our desire to shine breaks forth. Sometimes, also, with a patron's prodigality we offer him the beneficence of a public entertainment of our own choosing, unless we ask him to find amusement at our home, as we sometimes do to make up a party at cards, with the arriere pensee of exploiting him to our own profit. Do you think it the height of pleasure for others to admire us, to admit our superiority and to act as our tools? Is there anything in the world so disgusting as to feel oneself patronized, made capital of, enrolled in a claque? To give pleasure to others and take it ourselves we have to begin by removing the ego, which is hateful and then keep it in chains as long as the diversions last. There is no worse kill-joy than the ego. We must be good children, sweet and kind, button our coats over our medals and titles and with our whole heart put ourselves at the disposal of others.

Let us sometimes live—be it only for an hour, and though we must lay all else aside—to make others smile. The sacrifice is only in appearance. No one finds more pleasure for himself than he who knows how, without ostentation, to give himself that he may procure for those around him a moment of forgetfulness and happiness.

When shall we be so simply and truly men as not to obtrude our personal business and distresses upon the people we meet socially? May we not forget for an hour our pretensions, our strife, our distributions into sets and cliques—in short, our "parts"—and become as children once more, to laugh again that good laugh which does so much to make the world better?

Here I feel drawn to speak of something very particular, and in so doing to offer my well disposed readers an opportunity to go about a splendid business. I want to call their attention to several classes of people seldom thought of with reference to their pleasures.

It is understood that a broom serves only to sweep, a watering pot to water plants, a coffee mill to grind coffee, and likewise it is supposed that a nurse is designed only to care for the sick, a professor to teach, a priest to preach, bury and confess, a sentinel to mount guard; and the conclusion is drawn that the people given up to the more serious business of life are dedicated to labor, like the ox. Amusement is incompatible with their activities. Pushing this view still further, we think ourselves warranted in believing that the infirm, the afflicted, the bankrupt, the vanquished in life's battle and all those who carry heavy burdens are in the shade, like the northern slopes of mountains, and that it is so of necessity; whence the conclusion that serious people have no need of pleasure and that to offer it to them would be unseemly, while as to the afflicted, there would be a lack of delicacy in breaking the thread of their sad meditations. It seems therefore to be understood that certain persons are condemned to be always serious, that we should approach them in a serious frame of mind and talk to them only of serious things. So, too, when we visit the sick or unfortunate, we should leave our smiles at the door, compose our face and manner to dolefulness and talk of anything heartrending. Thus we carry darkness to those in darkness, shade to those in shade. We increase the isolation of solitary lives and the monotony of the dull and sad. We wall up some existences, as it were, in dungeons, and because the grass grows round their deserted prison house we speak low in approaching it, as though it were a tomb. Who suspects the work of infernal cruelty which is thus accomplished every day in the world! This ought not to be.

When you find men or women whose lives are lost in hard tasks or in the painful office of seeking out human wretchedness and binding up wounds, remember that they are beings made like you; that they have the same wants; that there are hours when they need pleasure and diversion. You will not turn them aside from their mission by making them laugh occasionally, these people who see so many tears and griefs. On the contrary, you will give them strength to go on the better with their work.

And when people whom you know are in trial, do not draw a sanitary cordon round them, as though they had the plague, that you cross only with precautions which recall to them their sad lot. On the contrary, after showing all your sympathy, all your respect, for their grief, comfort them, help them to take up life again, carry them a breath from the out of doors—something, in short, to remind them that their misfortune does not shut them off from the world.

And so extend your sympathy to those whose work quite absorbs them; who are, so to put it, tied down. The world is full of men and women sacrificed to others, who never have either rest or pleasure and to whom the least relaxation, the slightest respite, is a priceless good. And this minimum of comfort could be so easily found for them if only we thought of it. But the broom, you know, is made for sweeping, and it seems as though it could not be fatigued. Let us rid ourselves of this criminal blindness which prevents us from seeing the exhaustion of those who are always in the breach. Relieve the sentinels perishing at their posts; give Sisyphus an hour to breathe; take for a moment the place of the mother, a slave to the cares of her house and her children; sacrifice an hour of our sleep for some one worn by long vigils with the sick. Young girl, tired sometimes perhaps of your walk with your governess, take the cook's apron and give her the key to the fields. You will at once make others happy and be happy yourself. We go unconcernedly along beside our brothers who are bent under burdens we might take upon ourselves for a minute. And this short respite would suffice to soothe aches, revive the flame of joy in many a heart and open up a wide place for brotherliness. How much better would one understand another if he knew how to put himself heartily in that other's place, and how much more pleasure there would be in life!

I have spoken too fully elsewhere of systematizing amusements for the young to return to it here in detail, but I wish to say in substance what cannot be too often repeated: If you wish youth to be moral do not neglect its pleasures or leave to chance the task of providing them. You will perhaps say that young people do not like to have their amusements submitted to regulations and that, besides, in our day they are already overspoiled and divert themselves only too much. I shall reply, first, that one may suggest ideas, indicate directions, offer opportunities for amusement, without making any regulations whatever. In the second place, I shall make you see that you deceive yourselves in thinking youth has too much diversion. Aside from amusements that are artificial, enervating and immoral, that blight life instead of making it bloom in splendor, there are very few left today. Abuse, that enemy of legitimate use, has so befouled the world that it is becoming difficult to touch anything but what is unclean; whence watchfulness, warnings and endless prohibitions. One can hardly stir without encountering something that resembles unhealthy pleasure. Among young people of today, particularly the self respecting, the dearth of amusements causes real suffering. One is not weaned from this generous wine without discomfort. Impossible to prolong this state of affairs without deepening the shadow round the heads of the younger generations. We must come to their aid. Our children are heirs of a joyless world. We bequeath them cares, hard questions, a life heavy with shackles and complexities. Let us at least make an effort to brighten the morning of their days; let us interest ourselves in their sports, find them pleasure grounds, open to them our hearts and our homes; let us bring the family into our amusements; let gayety cease to be a commodity of export; let us call in our sons, whom our gloomy interiors send out into the street, and our daughters, moping in dismal solitude; let us multiply anniversaries, family parties and excursions; let us raise good humor in our homes to the height of an institution; let the schools, too, do their part; let masters and students—schoolboys and college boys—meet together oftener for amusement. It will be so much the better for serious work. There is no such aid to understanding one's professor as to have laughed in his company, and, conversely, to be well understood a pupil must be met elsewhere than in class or examination.

And who will furnish the money? What a question! That is exactly the error. Pleasure and money—people take them for the two wings of the same bird! A gross illusion! Pleasure, like all other truly precious things in this world, cannot be bought or sold. If you wish to be amused you must do your part toward it. That is the essential. There is no prohibition against opening your purse, if you can do it and find it desirable, but I assure you it is not indispensable. Pleasure and simplicity are two old acquaintances. Entertain simply, meet your friends simply. If you come from work well done, are as amiable and genuine as possible toward your companions and speak no evil of the absent, your success is sure.

Funeral of Mr. Jacob P. Gauer.

Last Thursday Mr. Jacob Peter Gauer, of near Sunnyside school house, aged 66 years, 5 months and 19 days, was laid to rest in the grave yard at the Red House church. Notwithstanding the inclement weather a large concourse of people gathered at the church to pay their last tributes of respect to a kind neighbor, friend, and a faithful brother member of the church.

The widow of the departed husband was too ill to accompany the funeral party to the church and consequently the funeral sermon will be preached at some future time.

The cause of Mr. Gauer's death was an affection of the lungs complicated with other causes.

Rev. E. Manges, pastor of St. Mark's Oakland, officiated at the funeral.

Uses the Newspapers.

The loser of a gold watch or a valuable piece of jewelery or a roll of bills never seeks to recover his property by sending out circulars, or hiring sandwitch men to parade the streets, or posters. He advertises his loss in the newspapers, if he has good judgment. Common sense tells him that he can reach the greatest number of people with least expense in that way. It gives the advertiser more for his money than he can obtain through any other channel of publicity.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there has come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hogs and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

How Stocksby Lost A Diamond Scarfpin

Stocksby came home to dinner looking glum. When his wife asked him the reason he said:

"I had a diamond scarfpin when I went out this morning, didn't I? Don't see it now, do you?

"Well, a fellow from Indianapolis has been calling on me for a week about a scheme in my line of business that seemed pretty good. He never sat down, but walked about as he unfolded his plans. Nervous sort of chap. Occasionally he stopped and picked a bit of lint off my coat or pecled one of your precious hairs off my collar. He seemed to see a bit of thread on me halfway across the room. You find plenty of men who have a habit of picking at your clothes like that, and I paid no attention to him, although it made me nervous.

"This morning he buttonholed me on the street close to the office. Couldn't come in, he said, feeling around my collar for bits of household material I had brought from home. Would call again. It was not until an hour later that I discovered my diamond pin was missing. Oh, I was easy for that fellow!"—New York Press.

An Eye to Business.

Passerby—I thought you were blind?

Mendicant—Well, times is so hard and competition is so great that even a blind man has to keep his eyes open nowadays if he wants to do business at all.

A Slight Misunderstanding.

To the hosiery department of a store went a woman leading by the hand a dark skinned, black haired little boy. To the sales girl she said:

"I want a pair of stockings for my little boy. Six is the size, I think. At any rate, it is the number that goes with a No. 10 shoe."

"Five and one-half is the size," said the girl. "What color?"

"Black, I think. Lisle thread."

"Feet white or black?" asked the sales girl.

The woman looked dazed, then angry. "You impertinent hussy!" she gasped. "Of course my boy's feet are white. I'll report you to the management and withdraw my custom from the store."

The girl cried, the floorwalker bustled up, and it took half an hour to make satisfactory explanations.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Worse.

Ely—Some one gave my wife a pair of red gloves for her birthday, and now she wants me to buy her a red dress to go with them.

Sly—That's nothing to my wife. She bought an automobile veil the other day, and now she wants me to buy an automobile to go with it.—Detroit Free Press.

Economizing.

Wife—George, I wouldn't buy any more accident insurance tickets. It's a mere waste of money.

Husband—Why, my dearest?

Wife—Because you are never lucky enough to use them. They never do us any good.—Judge.

Gertrude C. Jeffers, who sues by her husband and next friend, Alpheus M. Jeffers, Alpheus M. Jeffers, Addie Warnick, trustee, Beryl Warnick, Hazel Warnick and Beulah Warnick, infants, who sue by their next friend, George Warnick, and George Warnick, plaintiffs, v. Albert Warnick, Edward E. Warnick, Ida R. Duckworth and Stephen A. Duckworth, her husband, John C. Brydon, Louis B. Brydon and Gilmor S. Hamill, defendants.

No. 1338 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett county, Maryland.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree for the sale of Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, containing fifty acres each, situate, lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, and for a distribution of the proceeds thereof amongst the parties to this cause in proportion to their several interests.

The bill states that the said Gertrude C. Jeffers, Addie Warnick, trustee, for the use and benefit of her three infant children, the said Beryl Warnick, Hazel Warnick and Beulah Warnick, George Warnick, Albert Warnick, Edward E. Warnick and Ida R. Duckworth are each seized and possessed in fee simple of an undivided one seventh interest in and to said Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, and that a certain Truman P. Warnick was likewise seized and possessed of an undivided one-seventh interest in the said lands, the derivation of title to said respective interests being fully set forth in the several exhibits filed with said bill; and that the said Truman P. Warnick, on the 15th day of February, 1902, executed and delivered to the defendant, Gilmor S. Hamill, a mortgage upon his undivided one-seventh interest, and that having defaulted in the payment of the debt secured by said mortgage, on the 18th day of February, 1905, the said Hamill, mortgagee, exercised the power of sale contained in said mortgage and sold the interest of the said Truman P. Warnick in said lands to John C. Brydon and Louis B. Brydon to the extent of one-half of said undivided one-seventh interest, and to himself, the said Gilmor S. Hamill, to the extent of one-half of said undivided one-seventh interest, and duly reported said sale to this Court in a cause standing as No. 1315 Equity on the docket of said court as appears by the exhibit filed with said bill relating to said proceedings.

The bill further states that the plaintiffs together with the defendants are seized and possessed in fee simple, as tenants in common of the aforesaid Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, and that the parties to this suit above named are the only persons interested in said lands; that said real estate is not susceptible of partition without material loss and injury to the parties interested therein, and that in order to make division of said interests and more especially to protect and advance the interests of said infant children, it will be necessary that said real estate be sold and the proceeds thereof divided amongst the parties according to their several interests.

That the said Louis B. Brydon is a non-resident of the State of Maryland; that all the other parties to this cause reside within the State of Maryland, and that all of said parties are adults with the exception of the three infants above named.

The bill then prays for a decree for the sale of said real estate, a distribution among the parties according to their respective interests and for general relief, process and an order of publication.

It is thereupon, the 16th day of March, 1905, by the Circuit Court for Garrett county, in Equity, ordered, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper, published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 15th day of April, 1905, give notice to the said absent defendant of the object and substance of this bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor on or before the 1st day of May next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

FRIENDSVILLE HAD AN EARLY MORNING BLAZE

Last Saturday When the Store Building of William Ryland was Destroyed.

LOSS COVERED BY INSURANCE.

Fire Started In Second Story and Had Gained Considerable Headway When Discovered by Residents.

Saturday morning about three o'clock the large and very commodious store building belonging to Mr. William Ryland at Friendsville, this county, was discovered to be on fire by some of the residents of that town, the discovery being made long after the fire had started and when it was at its height. Nothing could be done to extinguish the fire, the town being without fire fighting apparatus of any description except that furnished by the volunteer bucket brigade, and as a result the building along with its contests consisting of a stock of groceries owned by Mr. Ryland, was entirely consumed.

The people worked manfully to save adjacent property to that which was burned succeeded in saving the building of Mr. D. S. Custer, located next to it, but not until after the Custer building had been on fire numerous times and was badly damaged. The proprietor of this property was seriously burned while fighting to save his house, his neck, arms, hands and ears being scorched very badly a physician's services being required to administer to him.

The Ryland property was built about ten years ago and cost in the neighborhood of five thousand dollars. The insurance on the property amounted to $4500, being placed through the agency of Mr. Chas. A Tower in Oakland.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there is come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hogs and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

TAXPAYERS' MEETING TUESDAY EVENING

Was Well Attended and Many Speeches Made—Committee Appointed to Meet Commissioners.

Tuesday night in accordance with the suggestion made in these columns last week, a crowd numbering nearly two hundred tax payers of the county, among them being some of the most prominent business men and heaviest tax payers, assembled in the opera house for the purpose of discussing the change in location of the proposed jail. Mr. Scott T. Jones, of Oakland, was elected chairman of the meeting with Mr. Samuel Lawton as secretary. The chairman explained the purpose of the gathering and in doing so read from a memorandum the locations, with the number of square feet in each, which could be secured for public buildings, which was followed by a general discussion upon the merits of the various proposed sites, those engaged in the discussion including Mayor McConas, Mr. Gilmor S Hamill, Mr. John H. Cuppett, Mr. William R. Offutt, Mr. A. D. Naylor, Mr. E. H. Sincell, Rev. John M. Davis, Mr. Chas. S. Davis, Mr. Thomas S. Martin and others, all of whom favored a change from the present location of the proposed jail.

At the conclusion of the speeches upon the matter a committee consisting of seven members along with Judges Henderson and Keedy were appointed, the chairman to arrange with the commissioners for a hearing upon the question when arguments were to be submitted for a change in the location, the time for such meeting to be left with the Commissioners.

In compliance with the power conferred, two members of the committee called upon the Commissioners last night and aked when it would be agreeable for that body to confer with the court and committee when two of the commissioners which is a majority, absolutely refused to consider a conference, basing their action for such refusal upon the fact that they had already selected the site for the jail and to make a change now would entail an additional expenditure of a few thousand dollars and subject them to censure by the people.

For the present the matter rests here. Another chapter may be added later.

Grange Lecture.

On Saturday of this week at 10 o'clock Prof. T. B. Symons, State Entomologist and a prominent Granger, will be at the Grange meeting to be held at Naylor's Hall in Oakland and at 1.30 in the afternoon he will give a practical demonstration of spraying an orchard near by, followed at 3.30 by a lecture on the subject at the hall.

MARCH TERM CIRCUIT COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Judge Henderson Opened Court Monday and Judge Keedy Arrived the Same Evening.

THE CHARGE TO THE GRAND JURY.

Delivered by Judge Henderson—Document Concise Touching Upon Condition of County Buildings—List of Grand Jurors.

Monday morning the March Term of the Circuit Court for Garrett county was convened with His Honor Judge Robert R. Henderson on the bench, and on Tuesday morning was joined by Judge Keedy, who arrived from his home in Hagerstown Monday afternoon.

The grand jury is composed of the following gentlemen:

Col. A. G. Sturgiss, foreman; Peter J. Lohr, Jonas Wampler, John H. Miller, John F. Ashby, D. O. DeWitt, Emil F. Droege, Joseph M. Conneway, Judson Foster, Samuel D. Brenneman, Jerome DeWitt, Floyd Duckworth, Eugene Teats, Donald Simpson, Henry Zinkan, John H. Sanders, F. L. Otto, M. T. Broadwater, Chas. L. Hoge, John L. Michael, John D. Taggart, Otto Kleopfel, Stuart F. Mason.

Judge Henderson's charge to the grand jury, printed below, is concise, and dwells at some length upon the condition of the present county buildings, the Court deprecating the risk incurred by property owners by the records being exposed to fire in the court house. The charge is as follows:

"You are now qualified as a part of the Circuit Court for Garrett county, with high powers and important duties. These are comprehensively and impressively defined in the oath you have just taken. Keep its provisions constantly in mind as watchwords of your office. If necessary get from the Clerk of the court a copy of its terms and make yourselves familiar with its spirit and meaning. Abide by it and the fulfillment of your duties will be assured. The sovereignty the State is behind you to protect you and inforce your proper orders.

"A few words as to the approved methods to be pursued by you in your work are all that I need say to you. It is usual and, in fact, necessary, that you have competent clerks to keep sufficient records of your doings. These records are of course covered by your oath of secrecy and must be carefully preserved.

"The first cases to be disposed of should be the jail cases: next recognizance cases, and then any other matters which may come up in a proper way.

"Each of you is bound to disclose any violation of law known to you whether you know of other witnesses or not. The jury as a body can determine how far to go in such cases.

"The long established rule for the determination of the question of indictment or not, is that you shall take no account of a probable defense or explanation of crime, if the evidence of guilt standing alone would be sufficient to justify you, if you sat as a petit jury, in convicting. Injustice is, of course, possible under this rule, but it is extremely improbable and approved practice has sanctioned it.

"I am told by the State's Attorney that the general peace and good order of the community, since our last session, have been preserved reasonably well. I need therefore only call your attention to certain laws which the law requires you to be apprised of. These are—Article 27, section 3, of the Code upon abortion; Article 27, section 47, regarding defalcation of public officers; the Act of 1902, Chapter 124, in regard to the mining laws. The States Attorney, who is your adviser, will explain these more fully to you.

"You must examine and report upon the condition of the county building before you adjourn.

"A new jail having been provided for, the present unsafe and unsanitary condition of that building will soon be relieved.

"The people of this county have apparently decided that this court house is adequate to their needs. Nothing but a destructive fire will, it seems convince them of the danger they are courting in exposing their records to the present fire risk, but the action of the people in voting down the proposed issue of court house bonds in no way excuses the County Commissioners from the duty of keeping this building, such as it is, in a proper and safe condition.

"The Court thinks that it has discharged its full duty by the reiteration for many years of its warning upon the subject. You are free, of course, to make such recommendations as seem proper. You must, however, report upon the condition of this building and you may hold those in responsibility up to a full discharge of their duties. If, in your investigation, of the liquor law it appears that there is not sufficient protection against abuse of the liquor traffic, you can recommend to your representatives such changes as seem wise, although this is not a part of your duties. You must see, however, that violators of the law are prosecuted.

"You will be expected to be prompt and regular in your attendance and not to absent yourselves without the permission of the Court.

"Any violation of your pledge of secrecy will be a contempt of court and a crimnal breach of your oath.

"The Court believes you are animated by a desire and purpose to do your full duty and expects no trouble upon that score.

"You may now retire to your room."

Upon Judge Henderson completing his charge to the grand jury a motion was made by Mr. Julius C. Renninger for the admission to the bar of Mr. A. Totten Matthews, of Oakland, who recently passed the State Bar examination in law. Judge Henderson ordered the applicant to be admitted to practice and accordingly he was sworn by Clerk Tower and signed the test book.

The several dockets were then called over and the usual entries made therein. A great number of cases, owing to the absence of Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord, who is in Washington, where he is undergoing a course of treatment, were continued and the length of the term will be very much curtailed as a result.

Resolutions upon the death of the late Edwin L. Mitchell, a member of the bar, were introduced and read by Mr. Thayer, followed by short addresses in memory of the deceased delivered by Attorneys Gilmor S. Hamill, N. S. Heindel, J. C. Renninger and G. S. Hamill, Jr., at the close of which Judge Henderson announced adjournment of Court for the balance of the day as a further mark of esteem and respect to the deceased.

TUESDAY SESSION.

Tuesday morning the civil appeal docket was taken up and disposed of as follows:

Stark vs. Whetsell; replevin; judgment for plaintiff. Renninger, Hamill.

Trials on the criminal appeal docket were disposed of:

State vs. D. Long; disturbing the public peace; guilty; $1 and costs Thayer, Renninger & Offutt.

State vs, John W. McCullough; polluting stream; guilty; fined $50 and costs. Thayer, Hamill.

State vs. Meadow Mountain Lumber Co.; same; plea of guilty confessed; fined $50 and costs. Thayer, Gordon.

State vs. Mahlon Glotfelty; same; not guilty. Same counsel.

TO-DAY'S SESSION.

As this paper goes to press C. L. Helcowitz is being tried upon the charge of criminally assaulting Mrs. Schmidt.

The court will probably run into the middle of next week.

Grand jury expects to be discharged tomorrow morning.

MARYLAND DAY IN THE SCHOOLS

Proclamation Of The Governor For Its Observances.

STUDY OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The Public Schools To Foster State Pride As A Patriotic And Civic Virtue—Press Called Upon to Assist.

Governor Edwin Warfield last Friday issued his proclamation to the people of Maryland for the proper observance of Marylynd Day on March 24. The proclamation says:

"There is a growing conviction with the people of Maryland that more opportunities should be offered and greater efforts put forth to foster State pride, instill lessons of patriotism and encourage obedience to and respect for established law, more especially in the minds and hearts of our boys and girls of school age.

"There can be found no more potent inspiration to patriotism than the study of our early history, thus familiarizing ourselves with the sacrifices made by those hardy pioneers who planted deep the seed of human liberty.

"The State Board of Education, recognizing that our schools should do something more to accomplish this end, did at its meeting held on February 25, 1903, designate March 25 (the day on which the Maryland pilgrims landed) of each year as Maryland Day, and recommended that said day of each year be devoted in all the public schools to the effective presentation of some particular event in the history of the State.

"The State Board of Education, acting in conjunction with the Society of Colonial Wars of the State of Maryland, selected 'Religious Toleration in Maryland' as the topic for presentation and consideration on Maryland Day this year.

"Now, therefore, I, Edwin Warfield, Governor of the State of Maryland, do hereby designate Saturday, March 25, 1905, as Maryland Day; but inasmuch as that date will fall on Saturday, a day when the public schools are not in session, the anniversary will be observed in the schools on Friday, March 24, 1905. That day shall be especially devoted to the study of the act of religious toleration or the separation of church and state in this colony.

"In order to direct general attention to this important event in our history, I request that all the public and private schools and colleges in the State will on that day devote attention to the study of this particular topic.

"The patriotic societies are accomplishing so much in creating an interest in our local history and in perpetuating the memory thereof, will, I hope, see fit to observe the celebration of this momentous event in a proper manner either on March 24 or March 25.

"Especially do I desire to enlist the interest and aid of those educators of the people—the newspapers of the State—and request that they will publish each year special articles on the topic selected for Maryland Day. They will thus make valuable contributions to the history of the State and at the same time instruct the people as can no other agency. The cooperation of all these educational forces cannot fail to make a deep impression on the public mind, and this will necessarily result in a greater interest in Maryland's glorious history and inspire a loftier State pride and a more intelligent, earnest and loyal patriotism."

In accordance with the proclamation above by the Chief Executive the day will be observed by the schools of Oakland, the exercises to be held in the opera house beginning at 10 o'clock, when Hon. George L. Wellington, of Cumberland, will be the orator of the day, that gentleman having accepted an invitation from Prof. McBee, principal, to come to Oakland on the accommodation train tomorrow morning when he will be met by a reception committee selected from the different professional and business callings represented in Oakland. From the train Senator Wellington will be escorted to the Commercial Hotel by the committee where he will remain until the scholars from the school are marched from the building down past the hotel when they as a body will escort him to the opera house. The scholars in their march from the school building will be headed by the Oakland band.

At the opera house the following program will be carried out, in the arrangement of which Prof. McBee has been untiring in his efforts:

Song, "Maryland, My Maryland.,"
Prayer, Rev. J. B. Workman,
Reading of the Governor's proclamation, Prof. J. Frank McBee.
Song, "Star Spangled Banner."
Essay, "What Maryland Day Means," Ralph Thayer.
Flag exercises, members of primary grade.
Recitation, selected, Reta Fraley.
Solo, "My Own United States, Grace Falkenstein.
Recitation, "Maryland," Nellie Workman.
Song, "Red, White and Blue."
Recitation, "Maryland, My Native State," Mary West..
Collection for Statute of Cecelius Calvert.
Addess, "Religious Toleration in Maryland," Hon. George L. Wellington.
Song, "America."
Benediction, Rev. John A. McClelland.

Levy Session.

By advertisement published elsewhere in this paper today the Board of County Commissioners give notice that a meeting of that body will be held on Tuesday, April 12th, for the purpose of laying the annual levy.

WE desire to state to the public that we have secured the agency for the

and will have same in stock the last of this week, and would be glad to have you come in and examine same, and you are at liberty to ask us all the questions you care to in regard to the fence as every rod is guaranteed perfect, and not like the fence with a solid stay, when bent down stay down, but the AMERICAN FENCE when properly put up will retain its shape under any and all conditions. We also have one of the neatest and most durable lawn, also chicken and rabbit fence on the market. They guaranteed their fence because they know of what it is made, how it is made and what it will do

Because the steel is produced from their own mines, and in its selection and treatment spare neither pains nor expense. The enviable reputation of the AMERICAN FENCE is not based on theory or what we say about it, but upon well tested and established merit. We will be glad to mail you catalogues, upon receipt of a postal card, telling all about same. We also carry in stock both smooth and barbed wire Fencing. Watch this space next week.

Mr. Scott T. Jones, of Oakland, was elected chairman of the meeting with Mr. Samuel Lawton as secretary. The chairman explained the purpose of the gathering and in doing so read from a memorandum the locations, with the number of square feet in each, which could be secured for public buildings, which was followed by a general discussion upon the merits of the various proposed sites, those engaged in the discussion including Mayor McConas, Mr. Gilmor S Hamill, Mr. John H. Cuppett, Mr. William R. Offutt, Mr. A. D. Naylor, Mr. E. H. Sincell, Rev. John M. Davis, Mr. Chas. S. Davis, Mr. Thomas S. Martin and others, all of whom favored a change from the present location of the proposed jail.

At the conclusion of the speeches upon the matter a committee consisting of seven members along with Judges Henderson and Keedy were appointed, the chairman to arrange with the commissioners for a hearing upon the question when arguments were to be submitted for a change in the location, the time for such meeting to be left with the Commissioners.

In compliance with the power conferred, two members of the committee called upon the Commissioners last night and aked when it would be agreeable for that body to confer with the court and committee when two of the commissioners which is a majority, absolutely refused to consider a conference, basing their action for such refusal upon the fact that they had already selected the site for the jail and to make a change now would entail an additional expenditure of a few thousand dollars and subject them to censure by the people.

For the present the matter rests here. Another chapter may be added later.

MARCH TERM CIRCUIT COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Judge Henderson Opened Court Monday and Judge Keedy Arrived the Same Evening.

THE CHARGE TO THE GRAND JURY.

Delivered by Judge Henderson—Document Concise Touching Upon Condition of County Buildings—List of Grand Jurors.

Monday morning the March Term of the Circuit Court for Garrett county was convened with His Honor Judge Robert R. Henderson on the bench, and on Tuesday morning was joined by Judge Keedy, who arrived from his home in Hagerstown Monday afternoon.

The grand jury is composed of the following gentlemen:

Col. A. G. Sturgiss, foreman; Peter J. Lohr, Jonas Wampler, John H. Miller, John F. Ashby, D. O. DeWitt, Emil F. Droege, Joseph M. Conneway, Judson Foster, Samuel D. Brenneman, Jerome DeWitt, Floyd Duckworth, Eugene Teats, Donald Simpson, Henry Zinkan, John H. Sanders, F. L. Otto, M. T. Broadwater, Chas. L. Hoge, John L. Michael, John D. Taggart, Otto Kleopfel, Stuart F. Mason.

Judge Henderson's charge to the grand jury, printed below, is concise, and dwells at some length upon the condition of the present county buildings, the Court deprecating the risk incurred by property owners by the records being exposed to fire in the court house. The charge is as follows:

"You are now qualified as a part of the Circuit Court for Garrett county, with high powers and important duties. These are comprehensively and impressively defined in the oath you have just taken. Keep its provisions constantly in mind as watchwords of your office. If necessary get from the Clerk of the court a copy of its terms and make yourselves familiar with its spirit and meaning. Abide by it and the fulfillment of your duties will be assured. The sovereignty the State is behind you to protect you and inforce your proper orders.

"A few words as to the approved methods to be pursued by you in your work are all that I need say to you. It is usual and, in fact, necessary, that you have competent clerks to keep sufficient records of your doings. These records are of course covered by your oath of secrecy and must be carefully preserved.

"The first cases to be disposed of should be the jail cases; next recognizance cases, and then any other matters which may come up in a proper way.

"Each of you is bound to disclose any violation of law known to you whether you know of other witnesses or not. The jury as a body can determine how far to go in such cases.

"The long established rule for the determination of the question of indictment or not, is that you shall take no account of a probable defense or explanation of crime, if the evidence of guilt standing alone would be sufficient to justify you, if you sat as a petit jury, in convicting. Injustice is, of course, possible under this rule, but it is extremely improbable and approved practice has sanctioned it.

"I am told by the State's Attorney that the general peace and good order of the community, since our last session, have been preserved reasonably well. I need therefore only call your attention to certain laws which the law requires you to be apprised of. These are—Article 27, section 3, of the Code upon abortion; Article 27, section 47, regarding defalcation of public officers; the Act of 1902, Chapter 124, in regard to the mining laws. The States Attorney, who is your adviser, will explain these more fully to you.

"You must examine and report upon the condition of the county building before you adjourn.

"A new jail having been provided for, the present unsafe and unsanitary condition of that building will soon be relieved.

"The people of this county have apparently decided that this court house is adequate to their needs. Nothing but a destructive fire will, it seems convince them of the danger they are courting in exposing their records to the present fire risk, but the action of the people in voting down the proposed issue of court house bonds in no way excuses the County Commissioners from the duty of keeping this building, such as it is, in a proper and safe condition.

"The Court thinks that it has discharged its full duty by the reiteration for many years of its warning upon the subject. You are free, of course, to make such recommendations as seem proper. You must, however, report upon the condition of this building and you may hold those in responsibility up to a full discharge of their duties. If, in your investigation, of the liquor law it appears that there is not sufficient protection against abuse of the liquor traffic, you can recommend to your representatives such changes as seem wise, although this is not a part of your duties. You must see, however, that violators of the law are prosecuted.

"You will be expected to be prompt and regular in your attendance and not to absent yourselves without the permission of the Court.

"Any violation of your pledge of secrecy will be a contempt of court and a crimnal breach of your oath.

"The Court believes you are animated by a desire and purpose to do your full duty and expects no trouble upon that score.

"You may now retire to your room."

Upon Judge Henderson completing his charge to the grand jury a motion was made by Mr. Julius C. Renninger for the admission to the bar of Mr. A. Totten Matthews, of Oakland, who recently passed the State Bar examination in law. Judge Henderson ordered the applicant to be admitted to practice and accordingly he was sworn by Clerk Tower and signed the test book.

The several dockets were then called over and the usual entries made therein. A great number of cases, owing to the absence of Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord, who is in Washington, where he is undergoing a course of treatment, were continued and the length of the term will be very much curtailed as a result.

Resolutions upon the death of the late Edwin L. Mitchell, a member of the bar, were introduced and read by Mr. Thayer, followed by short addresses in memory of the deceased delivered by Attorneys Gilmor S. Hamill, N. S. Heindel, J. C. Renninger and G. S. Hamill, Jr., at the close of which Judge Henderson announced adjournment of Court for the balance of the day as a further mark of esteem and respect to the deceased.

TUESDAY SESSION.

Tuesday morning the civil appeal docket was taken up and disposed of as follows:

Stark vs. Whetsell; replevin; judgment for plaintiff. Renninger, Hamill.

Trials on the criminal appeal docket were disposed of:

State vs. D. Long; disturbing the public peace; guilty; $1 and costs Thayer, Renninger & Offutt.

State vs, John W. McCullough; polluting stream; guilty; fined $50 and costs. Thayer, Hamill.

State vs. Meadow Mountain Lumber Co.; same; plea of guilty confessed; fined $50 and costs. Thayer, Gordon.

State vs. Mahlon Glotfelty; same; not guilty. Same counsel.

TO-DAY'S SESSION.

As this paper goes to press C. L. Helcowitz is being tried upon the charge of criminally assaulting Mrs. Schmidt.

The court will probably run into the middle of next week.

Grand jury expects to be discharged tomorrow morning.

MARYLAND DAY IN THE SCHOOLS

Proclamation Of The Governor For Its Observances.

STUDY OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The Public Schools To Foster State Pride As A Patriotic And Civic Virtue—Press Called Upon to Assist.

Governor Edwin Warfield last Friday issued his proclamation to the people of Maryland for the proper observance of Marylynd Day on March 24. The proclamation says:

"There is a growing conviction with the people of Maryland that more opportunities should be offered and greater efforts put forth to foster State pride, instill lessons of patriotism and encourage obedience to and respect for established law, more especially in the minds and hearts of our boys and girls of school age.

"There can be found no more potent inspiration to patriotism than the study of our early history, thus familiarizing ourselves with the sacrifices made by those hardy pioneers who planted deep the seed of human liberty.

"The State Board of Education, recognizing that our schools should do something more to accomplish this end, did at its meeting held on February 25, 1903, designate March 25 (the day on which the Maryland pilgrims landed) of each year as Maryland Day, and recommended that said day of each year be devoted in all the public schools to the effective presentation of same particular event in the history of the State.

"The State Board of Education, acting in conjunction with the Society of Colonial Wars of the State of Maryland, selected 'Religious Toleration in Maryland' as the topic for presentation and consideration on Maryland Day this year.

"Now, therefore, I, Edwin Warfield, Governor of the State of Maryland, do hereby designate Saturday, March 25, 1905, as Maryland Day; but inasmuch as that date will fall on Saturday, a day when the public schools are not in session, the anniversary will be observed in the schools on Friday, March 24, 1905. That day shall be especially devoted to the study of the act of religious toleration or the separation of church and state in this colony.

"In order to direct general attention to this important event in our history, I request that all the public and private schools and colleges in the State will on that day devote attention to the study of this particular topic.

"The patriotic societies are accomplishing so much in creating an interest in our local history and in perpetuating the memory thereof, will, I hope, see fit to observe the celebration of this momentous event in a proper manner either on March 24 or March 25.

"Especially do I desire to enlist the interest and aid of those educators of the people—the newspapers of the State—and request that they will publish each year special articles on the topic selected for Maryland Day. They will thus make valuable contributions to the history of the State and at the same time instruct the people as can no other agency. The cooperation of all these educational forces cannot fail to make a deep impression on the public mind, and this will necessarily result in a greater interest in Maryland's glorious history and inspire a loftier State pride and a more intelligent, earnest and loyal patriotism."

In accordance with the proclamation above by the Chief Executive the day will be observed by the schools of Oakland, the exercises to be held in the opera house beginning at 10 o'clock, when Hon. George L. Wellington, of Cumberland, will be the orator of the day, that gentleman having accepted an invitation from Prof. McBee, principal, to come to Oakland on the accommodation train tomorrow morning when he will be met by a reception committee selected from the different professional and business callings represented in Oakland. From the train Senator Wellington will be escorted to the Commercial Hotel by the committee where he will remain until the scholars from the school are marched from the building down past the hotel when they as a body will escort him to the opera house. The scholars in their march from the school building will be headed by the Oakland band.

At the opera house the following program will be carried out, in the arrangement of which Prof. McBee has been untiring in his efforts:

Song, "Maryland, My Maryland.,"
Prayer, Rev. J. B. Workman,
Reading of the Governor's proclamation, Prof. J. Frank McBee.
Song, "Star Spangled Banner."
Essay, "What Maryland Day Means," Ralph Thayer.
Flag exercises, members of primary grade.
Recitation, selected, Reta Fraley.
Solo, "My Own United States, Grace Falkenstein.
Recitation, "Maryland," Nellie Workman.
Song, "Red, White and Blue."
Recitation, "Maryland, My Native State," Mary West.
Collection for Statute of Cecelius Calvert.
Addess, "Religious Toleration in Maryland," Hon. George L. Wellington.
Song, "America."
Benediction, Rev. John A. McClelland.

Levy Session.

By advertisement published elsewhere in this paper today the Board of County Commissioners give notice that a meeting of that body will be held on Tuesday, April 12th, for the purpose of laying the annual levy.

WE desire to state to the public that we have secured the agency for the

and will have same in stock the last of this week, and would be glad to have you come in and examine same, and you are at liberty to ask us all the questions you care to in regard to the fence as every rod is guaranteed perfect, and not like the fence with a solid stay, when bent down stay down, but the AMERICAN FENCE when properly put up will retain its shape under any and all conditions. We also have one of the neatest and most durable lawn, also chicken and rabbit fence on the market. They guaranteed their fence because they know of what it is made, how it is made and what it will do

Because the steel is produced from their own mines, and in its selection and treatment spare neither pains nor expense. The enviable reputation of the AMERICAN FENCE is not based on theory or what we say about it, but upon well tested and established merit. We will be glad to mail you catalogues, upon receipt of a postal card, telling all about same. We also carry in stock both smooth and barbed wire Fencing. Watch this space next week.

New Use of the Subjunctive

By CATHERINE BURGESS

Copyright, 1904, by Catherine Burgess.

Margaret White was tired of commuting, tired of the daily ride on the elevated road from Christopher street to One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, very tired of the crowded class room at the end of it, so it is not strange that her mind, idle through design and strenuous through habit, picked out the broad shouldered young man who strode into the car at Forty-second and off again at One Hundred and Sixteenth street regularly as the morning came as a pleasant enough plaything.

Not that he was particularly good looking. He was distinguished only by a general purposefulness, eyes that looked neither to the right nor to the left, but buried themselves in the morning paper; a general air of being alone and liking it, which appealed to her state of being alone and not liking it.

Lately, instead of the newspaper, he had each morning drawn a book from his pocket and immediately become absorbed in it. It was not altogether a pleasant book, to judge from his face, which betrayed at times great irritation of spirit. Its covers were protected by a paper slip, calculated to balk the curiosity of whomsoever it might not concern. Margaret undoubtedly fell within this category, but that did not occur to her. An intentional device to arouse her curiosity could not have succeeded better.

One morning it chanced that the side of the car he always took was occupied by Italian laborers, dirty and malodorous. With hardly a glance at them and none at her, the man dropped into the seat at Margaret's side and produced his book. Alas! A side glance at it revealed only a Spanish grammar! Margaret could not have told what she had expected, but the unromantic fact suddenly let the whole affair down to the level of every day. The world again seemed cut out of one dingy piece, and all its uses flat, stale and unprofitable.

HE GUIDED HER TOWARD A COMPARATIVELY QUIET STREET.

Then habit asserted itself; the instinct of the teacher triumphed; in the student she forgot the man. His brow was knit as he searched the pages for something he apparently could not find. At last, oblivious to his surroundings, he muttered with emphasis, "Oh, hang!" The sound of his own voice recalled him. He glanced around guiltily. The Italians were stolidly unconscious of his existence, but he flushed as he met Margaret White's friendly gaze.

"Let me help you," she said softly.

Then hastily flushing in her turn at the wonder in his eyes, "I—I am a teacher, you see—and you seemed in difficulty."

His face cleared. Of course that explained everything. He answered frankly:

"I am. It's the subjunctive mood. I thought I was doing a fine thing when I got a native Spanish teacher, but he doesn't know much more English than I do Spanish, and between us heaven knows what tongue I am acquiring."

"I know; I've been through it," she assured him, smiling. "But tell me what puzzles you."

"As I said, the subjunctive. It's really the—the"—

"Exactly," she assented quickly. "It really is."

At One Hundred and Sixteenth street he shut the book with a triumphant snap.

"I'm getting hold of it," he announced. "I say, do you come up on this train often?"

"Every morning."

"Then"— But the train was already starting again. He had just time to dash to the platform and bow to Margaret at her window before it was gone. His smile, as he stood bareheaded in her last glimpse of him, completed the broken sentence.

Commuting lost its terrors after that. Many things may be said in twenty minutes, and, though Margaret conscientiously held her pupil to questions of syntax, she learned a good deal about him in spite of herself—that his name, for instance, was Harold Bond; that he was in the employ of a firm of piano manufacturers; that they were extending their business into Cuba and South America, and that he had the chance to represent them there if he could acquire a working knowledge of the language within two months.

She did not inquire when the two months would be up. She was not sure that she cared to know. Early in their friendship he had asked permission to visit her in her home, but she had replied that it would be embarrassing to introduce so irregular an acquaintance to the relatives with whom she lived, and he had not insisted. Perhaps she was a little disappointed that he had not.

One morning in June he squared his shoulders defiantly toward One Hundred and Sixteenth street and met her surprised glance with a look of decision.

"I am going on with you," he declared, "and I am going to walk over to school with you, and tonight I shall wait for you at the visitors' entrance and go home with you."

"Have I nothing to say about it?" she inquired.

"Certainly. You will say, 'I shall be very glad, indeed, my dear friend, to see you this afternoon and have an opportunity of presenting you to my family.'"

"And if I don't choose to say that?"

"Then I will introduce myself."

She was silent. For the first time her heart misgave her. What had been a pleasant adventure, something to brighten day dreams and think of vaguely between sleeping and waking, was turning into urgent reality.

At the foot of the elevated stairs he guided her toward a comparatively quiet street.

"I shall be late," she murmured, but obeyed.

"It doesn't matter," he replied. "Margaret, I have a confession to make. The first time we spoke to each other I asked you if you came up often by this route. I knew it without asking. I knew it before you ever noticed me—long before the days of the subjunctive mood. I followed you up here. I followed you to school. I held up a boy outside and found out who you were and what you taught, and then I bought a Spanish grammar. Margaret, sweetheart, forgive me"—for she had grown very pale. "I love you; I loved you then. I hated to do it, but we had no common friends, as people have in books. No accident ever happened in which I could rescue you. I couldn't speak to you first. I just had to depend upon your professional spirit and the subjunctive mood. Say you forgive me."

"And Cuba and your position and the rest of it?" she gasped.

"True as gospel," he answered. "Cuba is simply holding its breath till it can get our pianos. My 'position' is that of junior partner in the firm, and I am really going there—on my wedding trip, unless you would rather go somewhere else." Then pleadingly, "You wouldn't, would you?"

And Margaret surprised herself by whispering, "No." Afterward she reflected it was what she had meant to say all along.

Beef Tea.

This story was told by an old physician who had practiced for nearly fifty years in a small country town. One day he was summoned to a farmhouse, where he found a woman in a high fever and evidently exceedingly ill. He said to her husband, who was the only other person in the house:

"Your wife is very sick and must have nothing to eat except milk and beef tea, but I want you to give her a cup of one or the other every two hours." When he came the next morning and asked about his patient her husband said:

"That beef tea don't agree with her, doctor; it certainly don't. She began to feel bad as soon as she took it."

"That's odd," said the doctor. "You didn't give her any little bits of the meat in it, did you?"

"No, sir; I strained it first on account of the grounds."

"Grounds!" roared the doctor. "What did you make that beef tea out of?"

"Corn beef and the best green tea. I boiled 'em together all yesterday afternoon to get the strength out. But it don't agree with her, doctor; it certainly don't."

Your Watch Is a Compass.

"Most men who own a good watch," said a jeweler, "think they know all about it. They have the number fixed in their memory in case it is stolen. They could probably pick it out from fifty other watches with their eyes shut. But how many men know that their watch is a compass and will tell north from south as accurately as it will tell the time of day? Stanley, the explorer, did not know it until he had groped his way through the dark continent and met a Belgian sailor on the coast. Every watch is a compass. If you point the hour hand to the sun, the south is exactly halfway between the hour and the figure XII on the dial. Suppose, for instance, it is 4 o'clock. Point the hand indicating 4 to the sun and II on the watch is exactly south. If it is 8 o'clock, point the hand indicating 8 to the sun and the figure X on the dial is due south. No man need get lost if he carries a watch."

Only Art.

The studio "tea" had been a great success. The one small and very youthful member of the company had walked softly about, looking at the pictures. Just before the party broke up the artist discovered him surveying a picture of a lion with awe and interest.

"Don't be afraid, little chap," said the artist genially, patting his small guest on the head. "He won't hurt you."

"Oh, I'm not afraid at all," came the response in a clear treble that caused every one to listen. "He doesn't look a bit as if he were alive, you know."

"What Fur?"

SNUB NOSED, red haired, freckled lad;
Never had no chance er had
What y' might call schoolin'—jest
Raised among th' outriest.
Always seemed t' want t' know
Jest why things was thus an'
Look up in y'r face an' say
In th' most inquirin' way,
"What fur?"

Always tinkerin' around
Railroad shops an' always found
Somethin' there t' ask about;
Always findin' somethin' out.
Never saw a chain er shaft,
Belt er pulley but he'd hatt
T' look up in his curius way—
Look up in y'r face an' say,
"What fur?"

Wasn't satisfied t' know
That th' wheels went thus an' so;
Nothin' 'd ever satisfy
Him until he found out why.
Never saw a thing but he
Followed right t' A B C.
When he saw a wheel go round
Never give up till he found
"What fur."

Got a place—how, I can't say—
In th' railroad shops one day;
Always kep' his busy eye
Peeled an' always askin' why.
When a hole was bored—well, he
Would look down an' presently
Look up at some one an' say
In his own inquirin' way,
"What fur?"

Well, sir, next thing that I hear
He'd rigged up a h'istin' gear
All his own, discovered by
His eternal askin' why.
Got a patent fur it, then
Wuth a mint o' money. When
We told him we s'posed he'd quit
He jest says an' smiled a bit,
"What fur?"

Money jest come rollin' in
Faster 'n ever waves o' sin
Beat on earth. He didn't care;
Jest kep' cool an' stayed right there
'Side of us an', when we 'lowed
He'd forget th' common crowd,
Looked up, jest as when a child,
When he said an' sort o' smiled,
"What fur?"

Pardon, stranger; that 'ere tear
I've dropped on this castin' here
Is fur him. We liked him so;
Never proud a bit, y' know.
Typhoid, so the doctor said;
Don't perfess t' be well read
Er t' understand, but we
Nary one of us could see
"What fur."

A Telephonic Danger.

Paterfamilias (who has just rung up the call office and has his attention diverted by his little daughter)—Hello, dear, coming to kiss me good night?

Voice of Female Telephone Clerk (severely)—I beg your pardon!

His Reasons.

"No, I haven't got along very well in life," says our friend the dentist. "You see, I have seven children, and the expense of raising them is something great. Then business hasn't increased as I expected it would."

"Too many mouths to fill," we commiserate.

"Yes, and not enough teeth to fill," he adds.—Judge.

A Compliment.

"Did you ever have an editor say anything flattering to you?" asked the poet's friend.

"Yes. The editor of the Diurnal did once," replied the poet.

"Why, they don't pay for poetry."

"That's just what he said to me, intimating that my stuff was poetry."—Philadelphia Ledger.

His Ambition.

"Why don't you try to make a name that will be respected by future generations?"

"My dear sir," answered Mr. Dustin Stax, "my vanity does not go so far. I am content to make a fortune that is respected by the present generation."—Washington Star.

Preferred the Cash.

"My husband trusts you, doctor, implicitly."

"That's very kind of your husband, madam, but I'm not quite so sure that I can implicitly trust him."—Boston Herald.

Good Idea.

"They say Miss Highstepper is going to marry an army officer."

"Well, I should think that a man who makes a business of war might be able to get along with her."—Detroit Free Press.

A Symptom.

Mrs. Ascum—What makes you think your husband is seriously ill? He doesn't complain, does he?

Mrs. Wise—No; that's why I think he must be sick.—Baltimore News.

His Receptive Capacity.

"He has a wonderfully receptive mind."

"Yes, I understand he made $100,000 in a year once as a receiver."—Chicago Record-Herald.

The Objection.

Dumley—I suppose she didn't like my making sheep's eyes at her, eh?

Synnex—She objected to your using sheep's eyes [illegible] you did.—Boston Transcript.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE MERCENARY SPIRIT AND SIMPLICITY.

WE have in passing touched upon a certain widespread prejudice which attributes to money a magic power. Having come so near enchanted ground, we will not retire in awe, but plant a firm foot here, persuaded of many truths that should be spoken. They are not new, but how they are forgotten!

I see no possible way of doing without money. The only thing that theorists or legislators who accuse it of all our ills have hitherto achieved has been to change its name or form. But they have never been able to dispense with a symbol representative of the commercial value of things. One might as well wish to do away with written language as to do away with money. Nevertheless this question of a circulating medium is very troublesome. It forms one of the chief elements of complication in our life. The economic difficulties amid which we still flounder, social conventionalities and the entire organization of modern life have carried gold to a rank so eminent that it is not astonishing to find the imagination of man attributing to it a sort of royalty. And it is on this side that we shall attack the problem.

The term money has for appendage that of merchandise. If there were no merchandise there would be no money, but as long as there is merchandise there will be money, little matter under what form. The source of all the abuses which center around money lies in a lack of discrimination. People have confused under the term and idea of merchandise things which have no relation with one another. They have attempted to give a venal value to things which neither could have it nor ought to. The idea of purchase and sale has invaded ground where it may justly be considered an enemy and a usurper. It is reasonable that wheat, potatoes, wine, fabrics, should be bought and sold, and it is perfectly natural that a man's labor procure him rights to life and that there be put into his hands something whose value represents them, but here already the analogy ceases to be complete. A man's labor is not merchandise in the same sense as a sack of flour or a ton of coal. Into this labor enter elements which cannot be valued in money. In short, there are things which can in nowise be bought—sleep, for instance, knowledge of the future, talent. He who offers them for sale must be considered a fool or an impostor, and yet there are gentlemen who coin money by such traffic. They sell what does not belong to them, and their dupes pay fictitious values in veritable coin. So, too, there are dealers in pleasure, dealers in love, dealers in miracles, dealers in patriotism, and the title of merchant, so honorable when it represents a man selling that which is in truth a commodity of trade, becomes the worst of stigmas when there is question of the heart, of religion, of country.

Almost all men are agreed that to barter with one's sentiments, his honor, his cloth, his pen, or his note, is infamous. Unfortunately this idea, which suffers no contradiction as a theory and which thus stated seems rather a commonplace than a high moral truth, has infinite trouble to make its way in practice. Traffic has invaded the world. The money changers are established even in the sanctuary, and by sanctuary I do not mean religious things alone, but whatever mankind holds sacred and inviolable. It is not gold that complicates, corrupts and debases life; it is our mercenary spirit.

The mercenary spirit resolves every thing into a single question. How much is that going to bring me? and sums up everything in a single axiom. With money you can procure anything. Following these two principles of conduct, a society may descend to a degree of infamy impossible to describe or to imagine.

How much is it going to bring me? This question, so legitimate while it concerns those precautions which each ought to take to assure his subsistence by his labor, becomes pernicious as soon as it passes its limits and dominates the whole life. This is so true that it vitiates even the toil which gains our daily bread. I furnish paid labor; nothing could be better. But if to inspire me in this labor I have only the desire to get the pay nothing could be worse. A man whose only motive for action is his wages does a bad piece of work. What interests him is not the doing, it's the gold. If he can Mer- wrench in pains without lessening his gains, be assured that he will do it. Plowman, mason, factory laborer, he who loves not his work puts into it neither interest nor dignity—is, in short, a bad workman. It is not well to confide one's life to a doctor who is wholly engrossed in his fees, for the spring of his action is the desire to garnish his purse with the contents of yours. If it is for his interest that you should suffer longer, he is capable of fostering your malady instead of fortifying your strength. The instructor of children who cares for his work only so far as it brings him profit is a sad teacher, for his pay is indifferent and his teaching more indifferent still. Of what value is the mercenary journalist? The day you write for the dollar, your prose is not worth the dollar you write for. The more elevated in kind is the object of human labor, the more the mercenary spirit, if it be present, makes this labor void and corrupts it.

There are a thousand reasons to say that all toil merits its wage, that every man who devotes his energies to providing for his life should have his place in the sun and that he who does nothing useful—does not gain his livelihood, in short—is only a parasite. But there is no greater social error than to make gain the sole motive of action. The best we put into our work—be that work done by strength of muscle, warmth of heart or concentration of mind—is precisely that for which no one can pay us. Nothing better proves that man is not a machine than this fact: Two men at work with the same forces and the same movements produce totally different results. Where lies the cause of this phenomenon? In the divergence of their intentions. One has the mercenary spirit, the other has singleness of purpose. Both receive their pay, but the labor of the one is barren; the other has put his soul into his work. The work of the first is like a grain of sand, out of which nothing comes through all eternity; the other's work is like the living seed thrown into the ground. It germinates and brings forth harvests. This is the secret which explains why so many people have failed while employing the very processes by which others succeed. Automatons do not reproduce their kind, and mercenary labor yields no fruit.

Unquestionably we must bow before economic facts and recognize the difficulties of living. From day to day it becomes more imperative to combine well one's forces in order to succeed in feeding, clothing, housing and bringing up a family. He who does not rightly take account of these crying necessities, who makes no calculation, no provision for the future, is but a visionary or an incompetent and runs the risk of sooner or later asking alms from those at whose parsimony he has sneered. And yet what would become of us if these cares absorbed us entirely—if, mere accountants, we should wish to measure our effort by the money it brings, do nothing that does not end in a receipt, and consider as things worthless or pains lost whatever cannot be drawn up in figures on the pages of a ledger? Did our mothers look for pay in loving us and caring for us? What would become of filial piety if we asked it for loving and caring for our aged parents?

What does it cost you to speak the truth? Misunderstandings, sometimes sufferings and persecutions. To defend your country? Weariness, wounds and often death. To do good? Annoyance, ingratitude, even resentment. Self sacrifice enters into all the essential actions of humanity. I defy the closest calculators to maintain their position in the world without ever appealing to aught but their calculations. True, those who know how to make their "pile" are rated as men of ability. But look a little closer. How much of it do they owe to the unselfishness of the simple hearted? Would they have succeeded had they met only shrewd men of their own sort, having for device, "No money, no service?" Let us be outspoken. It is due to certain people who do not count too rigorously that the world gets on. The most beautiful acts of service and the hardest tasks have generally little remuneration or none. Fortunately there are always men ready for unselfish deeds, and even for those paid only in suffering, though they cost gold, peace and even life. The part these men play is often painful and discouraging. Who of us has not heard recitals of experiences wherein the narrator regretted some past kindness he had done, some trouble he had taken, to have nothing but vexation in return? These confidences generally end thus: "It was folly to do the thing!" Sometimes it is right so to judge, for it is always a mistake to cast pearls before swine. But how many lives there are whose sole acts of real beauty are these very ones of which the doers repent because of men's ingratitude! Our wish for humanity is that the number of these foolish deeds may go on increasing.

And now I arrive at the credo of the mercenary spirit. It is characterized by brevity. For the mercenary man the law and the prophets are contained in this one axiom: "With money you can get anything." From a surface view of our social life nothing seems more evident. "The sinews of war," "the shining mark," "the key that opens all doors," "king money"—if one gathered up all the sayings about the glory and power of gold he could make a litany longer than that which is chanted in honor of the Virgin. You must be without a penny, if only for a day or two, and try to live in this world of ours, to have any idea of the needs of him whose purse is empty.

I invite those who love contrasts and unforeseen situations to attempt to live without money three days and far from their friends and acquaintances—in short, far from the society in which they are somebody. They will gain more experience in forty-eight hours than in a year otherwise. Alas for some people! They have this experience thrust upon them, and when veritable ruin descends around their heads it is useless to remain in their own country, among the companions of their youth, their former colleagues, even those indebted to them. People affect to know them no longer. With what bitterness do they comment on the creed of money! With gold one may have what he will; without it, impossible to have anything. They become pariahs, lepers, whom every one shuns. Flies swarm round cadavers; men round gold. Take away the gold, nobody is there. Oh, it has caused tears to flow, this creed of gain—bitter tears, tears of blood, even from those very eyes which once adored the golden calf!

And, with it all, this creed is false, quite false. I shall not advance to the attack with hackneyed tales of the rich man astray in a desert who cannot get even a drop of water for his gold, or the decrepit millionaire who would give half he has to buy from a stalwart fellow without a cent his twenty years and his lusty health; no more shall I attempt to prove that one cannot buy happiness. So many people who have money and so many more who have not would smile at this truth as the hardest ridden of saws. But I shall appeal to the common experience of each of you, to make you put your finger on the clumsy lie hidden beneath an axiom that all the world goes about repeating.

Fill your purse to the best of your means and let us set out for one of the watering places of which there are so many—I mean some little town formerly unknown and full of simple folk, respectful and hospitable, among whom it was good to be, and cost little. Fame with her hundred trumpets has announced them to the world and shown them how they can profit from their situation, their climate, their personality. You start out on the faith of Dame Rumor, flattering yourself that with your money you are going to find a quiet place to rest and, far from the world of civilization and convention, weave a bit of poetry into the warp of your days.

The beginning is good. Nature's setting and some patriarchal costumes, slow to disappear, delight you. But as time passes the impression is spoiled. The reverse side of things begins to show. This which you thought was as true antique as family heirlooms is naught but trickery to mystify the credulous. Everything is labeled; all is for sale, from the earth to the inhabitants. These primitives have become the most consummate of sharpers. Given your money, they have resolved the problem of getting it with the least expense to themselves. On all sides are nets and traps, like spiders' webs, and the fly that this gentry lies snugly in wait for is you. This is what twenty or thirty years of venality has done for a population once simple and honest, whose contact was grateful indeed to men worn by city life. Homemade bread has disappeared, butter comes from the dealer, they know to an art how to skim milk and adulterate wine; they have all the vices of dwellers in cities without their virtues.

As you leave you count your money. So much is wanting that you make complaint. You are wrong. One never pays too dear for the conviction that there are things which money will not buy.

You have need in your house of an intelligent and competent servant. Attempt to find this rara avis. According to the principle that with money one may get anything, you ought, as the position you offer is inferior, ordinary good or exceptional, to find servants unskilled, average, excellent, superior. But all those who present themselves for the vacant post are listed in the last category and are fortified with certificates to support their pretensions. It is true that nine times out of ten when put to the test these experts are found totally wanting. Then why did they engage themselves with you? They ought in truth to reply as does the cook in the comedy, who is dearly paid and proves to know nothing:

Why did you hire out as a cordon bleu?
It was to get bigger commissions.

That is the great affair. You will always find people who like to get big wages. More rarely you find capability. And if you are looking for probity the difficulty increases. Mercenaries may be had for the asking; faithfulness is another thing. Far be it from me to deny the existence of faithful servants, at once intelligent and upright. But you will encounter as many, if not more, among the ill paid as among those most highly salaried. And it little matters where you find them, you may be sure that they are not faithful in their own interest; they are faithful because they have some what of that simplicity which renders us capable of self abnegation.

We also hear on all sides the adage that money is the sinews of war. There is no question but that war costs much money, and we know something about it. Does this mean that in order to defend herself against her enemies and to honor her flag a country need only be rich? In olden time the Greeks took it upon themselves to teach the Persians the contrary, and this lesson will never cease to be repeated in history. With money ships, cannon, horses may be bought, but not so military genius, administrative wisdom, discipline, enthusiasm. Put millions into the hands of your recruiters and charge them to bring you a great leader and an army. You will find a hundred captains instead of one, and a thousand soldiers. But put them under fire; you will have enough of your hirelings! At least one might imagine that with money alone it is possible to lighten misery. Ah, that, too, is an illusion from which we must turn away. Money, be the sum great or small, is a seed which germinates into abuses. Unless there go with it intelligence, kindness, much knowledge of men, it will do nothing but harm, and we run great risk of corrupting both those who receive our bounty and those charged with its distribution.

Money will not answer for everything; it is a power, but it is not all powerful. Nothing complicates life, demoralizes man, perverts the normal course of society, like the development of venality. Wherever it reigns everybody is duped by everybody else; one can no longer put trust in persons or things, no longer obtain anything of value. We would not be detractors of money, but this general law must be applied to it: Everything in its own place. When gold, which should be a servant, becomes a tyrannical power, affronting morality, dignity and liberty; when some exert themselves to obtain it at any price, offering for sale what is not merchandise, and others, possessing wealth, fancy that they can purchase what no one may buy, it is time to rise against this gross and criminal superstition and cry aloud to the imposture, "Thy money perish with thee!" The most precious things that man possesses he has almost always received gratuitously. Let him learn so to give them.

PARENTS OWE TO THEIR CHILDREN

Obligations Which Should Be Borne In Mind.

We hear and read so much of what the child owes the parents, that it is well to keep in mind the fact that parents owe much to the child. Their duty is not done when the child has been fed, clothed, and sent to school, although many parents think they have done all that God or man demands when this is accomplished.

It is right to exact obedience from a child, and show him why it is best to certain things. The pert and precocious child is never obedient. He thinks himself above the law of obedience, and grows into a disgreeable young person who makes no friends.

Parents owe it the children to make of them men and women whom all will delight to honor. This must be done by both precept and example. It is useless to tell a boy it is wrong to gamble, and then play cards for stakes in his presence. The precocious child will always see a chance of making money in an easy way, and before he is old enough to gamble in cards he will use his marbles and playthings as a source of revenue. He learned the fundamental principle from his parents, and they have only themselves to blame.

The parents owe it to the child to teach him honesty, not because it is the best policy, but because it is right. The child should be taught to respect the belongings of every member of the family. Honesty begins there. These belongings are not common property, and he should be made to understand this; nor should he be permitted to impose upon his playmates, and rob them of their toys. Their marbles and other playthings must not be obtained fraudulently, unless the parents are willing to see him grow up without honor and principle. The precious boy can usually "get on in the world," but he does not always accomplish it fairly.

If parents indulge in liquors in the presence of the child, they can scarcely expect him to grow into a sober man. If he does, it is by sheer force of his own good sense and principle. Precept and example must be the motto of the parents. They cannot follow "The primrose path of dalliance," and expect the child to climb "the steep and thorny way to heaven." Shakespeare taught us more wisely than that.

The life of the parents must be one of self-denial, and a renunciation of everything that makes life pleasant, if that be necessary to the proper training of the child. He who is so brought up surely will never go astray. It is usually the pert boy, feels that he is just a little wiser than his parents, who becomes the bragging, irresponsible man.

The child will often place the blame of some personal shortcoming on the parents of an excuse for himself. Said I to a boy, one day:

"Why do you smoke? Your father did not use tobacco."

"No," he replied, "I inherit my taste from my grandfather."

That was not a manly nor a kind thing to say, but he was one of the irresponsible who put upon the shoulders of others his own shortcomings. He was a precocious boy who reasoned for himself.

After all, the highest ambition of parents for the child should not be to make of him the most brilliant and successful man, but the best and kindest. Kindness is one of the things to be prayed for every day.

HIGHWAY ENGINEERS.

The Necessity Of Employing Them in Road Building.

The condition of the highways is an index of the progressiveness of the people. In addition to the importance of shortcoming distance by bringing the buyer and seller closer together and thus giving to the farmer a more available market for his produce, good roads help on to a wonderful degree the social and educational advancement of the rural district.

The doctrine of good roads has been thoroughly preached, and their advantages seem to be so thoroughly recognized throughout the entire country that public sentiment is unanimously in favor of road reform, writes Colonel Albert Pope in Good Roads Magazine. This is true even among the people of smaller towns and rural districts, where they are awakening to the realization of the direct bearing of good roads on business prosperity.

The question that confronts us today is not "Shall we have good roads?" but "What is the best way to secure them?" It must be conceded that an initiative step is to give up everywhere the time worn and pernicious system of working out a road tax. In many communities a direct road tax has been substituted, the proceeds of which are expended on the highways under the supervision of experts. The subject of state and national highways has been broadly discussed and generally approved, though there is still a mooted point as to how much the general government shall furnish, how much the state shall pay and and what proportion of the expense shall be borne by the counties and townships.

I believe the counties and towns should meet practically half the expense of construction and that the state should own the road when completed. While Massachusetts has appropriated liberal sums for this important work, it would be a financial investment to increase this expenditure on this plan, because many regions willing to stand their proper part of the expense cannot under the present arrangement get a part of the appropriation and others cannot get enough.

To have good roads we must have skilled road engineers. Therefore the first step to be taken by any community should be to secure the services of trained men, under whose guidance new roadways would be constructed and both old and new kept in repair.

The work accomplished by Massachusetts has attracted a great deal of attention because of the system attained under the system adopted by that state. Work on the highways is always supervised by skilled men. Sections of state roads have been built in all parts of the commonwealth with the idea of practically demonstrating to the people in the different localities the best methods to be pursued in the building and maintainance of good roads, and of late the work has been to connect these sections and thus complete through roads. This plan has worked successfully in that it has by these object lessons interested towns and counties to follow the example of the state highway commission in extending good roads. In many instances smaller townships have purchased and are working stone crushing plants and such other machinery as is necessary to keep their highways in proper condition.

The leading educational institutions of the country have recognized the importance of this question, and many have put into their curriculum a special coures in road engineering. If I were living in a community whose interests demanded the improvement of the highways I would urge the paramount importance of getting hold of skilled men. Under them there should be made a careful topographical survey of the region to be improved and its available road materials located and tested. With this preliminary task accomplished the work of the road building can be successfully and economically pushed.

BITTINGER.

Almost every community has in its midst an uncouth philosopher from whose uncomely speech we catch occasional glimpses of the rarest gems of thought, the richness and beauty of which outshine the empty fluency of speech commonly called culture as does the rarest diamond outshine the paste imitation on a dude's cheap linen. We find honest men in ragged jackets, helpful thoughts in humble minds, and he who first finds diamonds, finds them first in "the rough."

Sugar making began in this region last week. Some sap was gathered and converted into sugar and syrup. All camps were not opened however, owing to the inability to get about on account of snow which still lay to considerable depth in some localities.

The first smile of spring has been beaming upon us for a few days and the robin and blue bird make a cheerful noise all the day long. Hail joyous spring-time with thy balmy breezes and fragrant flowers.

Constable Stahl was in this vicinity last week summoning various of our citizens to appear before the court at its present session.

Miss Agnes Bittinger spent a portion of the past week at Jennings with her sister Mrs. George Yommer, who was ill.

Mrs. K. A Bittinger lost a fine cow last week. The loss will be sorely felt by Mrs. Bittinger, and it is hoped our good people will see to it that the loss be repaid.

Mr. J. L. Beechy is running Jeff. Lohr's sugar camp this season.

Mr. Jonas Bittinger, who was housed up for a few days with the grippe, is about again.

Miss Laura Facenbaker, who was employed at Jennings for a few weeks, is home again.

Miss Carrie Hetrich is helping Mrs. Frances Bittinger through the busy spring season.

In a wreck on the Jennings Railroad last Friday two cars laden with lumber were derailed and traffic was delayed for some time.

Mrs. G. W. Engle who spent the winter in Baltimore, is expected home this week.

Tribute to Silas Young.

Our old veteran friend who died on the 2d of March last, Mr. Silas Young, was borne in Rockingham county, Viginia, 82 years ago, and at the age of 18 moved to Nicholas county, West Virginia, and when the war between the States broke out, in 1861, he joined the Union army, and served until discharged at the close of that struggle and was honored by a memorial given him for his heroism in many of the battles in and around Petersburg and Richmond and was promoted corporal after the battle of Hatcher's Run, near Richmond, in 1864.

This kind friend often talked to the writer of his boyhood days in the Valley of Virginia and of many families that it was my pleasure to become acquainted with in the vicinity in which he lived until 18 years old. He often spoke of the old school house near Mt. Clinton, known as "Crawford school house," which was very familiar to all of McNeil's Command as we often camped in it during the war, and if this comes to the notice of James W. Mason, Henry W. Ridder, and Wm. H. Pool, and others of the Rough Riders, it will bring back pleasant recollections of our Valley campaign.

In closing this tribute to this ex-soldier friend, I must say I never met a more generous foe of forty years ago who was so gentle and kind in speaking of those dark and bloody days, and in all of his remarks about the great heroes on both sides—Lee, Jackson and Grant—were his ideals of the true and gallant soldier and as military geniuses he ever compared them to Napoleon.

Good kind friend, you have gone to answer the last roll-call and I feel assured by your pure and honest record left behind that you will meet "The Great Captain" with the plaudit "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

With all the warmth of my heart going out to the bereaved daughter left behind, I say peace to his ashes.

A FRIEND.

Making Cement Bricks.

In Salisbury, Md., Frank C. Todd is installing a plant for making ornamental face bricks of concrete, as well as building blocks from the same material.

The methods of mixing the cement with earth and the manufacturing of the brick is original with Mr. Todd. It is something similar to the German sand-lime method, excepting no lime is used. This is mainly where the secret lies. Artificial heat is used to dry the brick, and it requires from five to seven days after the brick is made before it is ready for delivery. Mr. Todd has been experimenting with this method of brick making for the last two years, and he thinks has at last struck the real thing in something new. There is but one other place in the country that Mr. Todd is aware of where bricks are manufactured in the same manner, but each is original in itself.—Salisbury Courier.

LAW IN REGARD TO CIGAR BOXES

Dealers Must Not Give Them Away or Sell Them After May 1.

Cumberland dealers in cigars have been notified during the past few days that on and after May 1st they will not be permitted to give away or sell empty boxes. The latter, while usually regarded as inoffensive things which the average merchant is glad to give away in order to get rid of them, have been causing the revenue authorities no end of trouble in the large cities and those sections where cigars are manufactured on a more extensive scale than in this vicinity.

In those parts where tobacco is grown on an extensive scale there are many small manufacturers of cigars. These small manufacturers are the ones who have been causing the trouble. It is alleged they frequently make cheap cigars and place them in empty boxes that had contained high-priced cigars. Through unscrupulous dealers it is an easy matter to get the cigars on the market. Not only is the Government cheated in this way but the manufacturers of high grade cigars suffer.

It has been suggested that the only way in which dealers will be able to protect themselves will be to destroy the boxes the moment the last cigar is removed. Otherwise the box might accidently fall into the hands of another party. Under the law both parties would be liable. The law, in part follows:

Whenever any person sells, gives, purchases or receives any box * branded or marked in any way so as to show that the contents or intended contents thereof have been duly inspected, or that the tax thereon has been complied with, whether such * branding otherwise without authority of law, said box* being empty he shall be liable to a penalty of not less than fifty nor more than five hundred. And every person who makes, manufacturers or products any box * branded or marked as above described, or * brands or marks the same, as hereinbefore recited, shall be liable to penalty as before provided in this section. And every person who violates the foregoing provisions of this section, with intent to defraud the revenue, or defraud any person, shall be liable to a fine of not less than one thousand nor more than five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court. And all articles sold, given, purchased, received, made, manufactured, produced, branded, stamped, or marked in violation of the provisions of this section, and all their contents shall be forfeited to the United States.

Commenting on the above the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says: It will be observed that the foregoing provisions of the law clearly denounce penalties for the making or using of any empty cigar box, branded or marked in any way purporting to show that any provisions of the internal revenue law have been complied with in respect to such box. These punishments, both corporal and pecuniary, are so severe that Internal Revenue Commissioner has in the past hesitated to provoke them for the prevention of the practice in the trade of making and using "dummy" cigar boxes for advertising purposes, a practice innocent enough in itself, and not ordinary resulting in any fraud on the revenue. When, however, the empty boxes or receptacles are marked or branded with factory numbers and caution notices there can be no doubt as to the applicability of the statute to them, and it becomes necessary that all parties interested, both manufacturers and dealers, should be informed that the practice of making and using such marked and branded boxes must be discontinued or the consequences suffered.

In view of the fact that the statute in question has not heretofore been applied in such cases, and to the prevalence of the practice of making and using marked and branded empty cigar boxes, it is deemed proper to give public notice that the practice must be stopped and that after a reasonable time violators of the statute will be prosecuted.

Any such empty marked and branded cigar boxes found in the hands of dealers on and after May 1, proximo, will be seized for forfeiture and personal proceedings will also be taken under the law provided for such cases. —Cumberland News.

THE above picture of the man and fish is the trade-mark of Scott's Emulsion, and is the synonym for strength and purity. It is sold in almost all the civilized countries of the globe.

If the cod fish became extinct it would be a world-wide calamity, because the oil that comes from its liver surpasses all other fats in nourishing and life-giving properties. Thirty years ago the proprietors of Scott's Emulsion found a way of preparing cod liver oil so that everyone can take it and get the full value of the oil without the objectionable taste. Scott's Emulsion is the best thing in the world for weak, backward children, thin, delicate people, and all conditions of wasting and lost strength.

ENGINEER KILLED AT ROWLESBURG

James Kitzmiller Struck By B. and O. Helper Engine.

James Kitzmiller, engineer on the Third division of the Baltimore and Ohio, on engine No. 1866, was run over by a helper engine at Rowlesburg, early Friday morning and instantly killed. Kitzmiller's train had stopped at Rowlesburg and the engineer was out of the cab oiling his locomotive, when the helper backed down upon him. Death was instant and the remains were horribly mangled. They were picked up by the crew of the freight train and taken to the home of the deceased. Last summer Mr. Kitzmiller was knocked from the cab of his engine in Oakland by being struck on the head by the penstalk at the station but his injuries were of a slight nature.

Mr. Kitzmiller was about thirty-eight years of age and was one of the best known engineers on the Baltimore and Ohio. He lived in South Cumberland prior to a few months ago, when he was removed to Keyser. He was a cousin of the late George W. Kitzmiller, who dropped dead in Baltimore on March 5th.

DIED.

Abernathy—On Sunday, March 19th, at his home near Wilson, Mr. James Abernathy, aged 81 years, the deceased being one of the pioneer settlers of Garrett county. He was the father of ex-County Commissioner Isaac W. Abernathy and was a good citizen in every sense of the word. His funeral took place from his late home on Tuesday of this week, the interment being made at Fairview church, of which the deceased was a devout and consistent member.

ASHBY—At Bond, on Saturday last, the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Ashby. The funeral took place at Crellin on Monday following.

KOCH—At the home of his father, south of Oakland, after an illness of a few days of pneumonia, Jesse, aged about twenty years, son of Mr. Christian Koch. The deceased had been employed at Swallow Falls where he was taken ill and brought to his late home on Wednesday of last week, his death occuring on Sunday. The funeral took place Tuesday.

Book of the Royal Blue.

The current issue of the Baltimore & Ohio's popular magazine—The Book of the Royal Blue—has devoted many pages to the International Convention of Christian Endeavor to be held in Baltimore July next, including a very concise history of the Society, a description of the Convention City, its many attractions and surroundings, and a full programme of the Convention. It is a splendid text book for prospective visitors.

Aside from this star feature, the number is especially interesting, having contributions from many of the best writers.

S. E. Kiser, of Chicago, has a short story, "How the Governor was Hoodwinked;" Elihu S. Riley, of Annapolis, tells the story of the "Headless Man of Annapolis." Among the poets who have contributed are Edmond Vance Cooke, the author and lecturer of Cleveland; S. W. Gillilan and Victor A. Hermann, of Baltimore.

A new department "Humor and the Humorist," which is conducted by the editor, has a series of heart to heart talks with and about the men who make you laugh.

Single copies will be mailed for five cents each; annual subscription, fifty cents. Address D. B. Martin, Manager Passenger Traffic, B. & O. R. R., Baltimore.

Death of Highly Respected Citizen.

MOSSER.—At the his home near Fairfax, this county, on Sunday, the 19th inst., George L. Mosser, aged 78 years, 1 month and 19 days. His remains were buried at the Red House church on the 21st inst., Rev. D. W. Cunningham, of Terra Alta, W. Va., officiating. Rev. Cunningham delivered an impressive sermon from Rev. 14:13: "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth. Yea saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours and their works do follow them." A portion of St. John's Evangelical Lutheran choir rendered "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," and "Asleep in Jesus," two favorite hymns of the dead, in a very impressive manner.

He was a consistent member of the Lutheran church for fifty years and a regular attendant at all church services.

His remains were followed to the grave by a large concourse of sorrowing relatives, friends and neighbors, which manifested the high esteem in which he was held by those who knew him.

The pall-bearers were Messrs. Owen Brenegar, Patrick Flynn, Jonn Hamill, Oliver Feather, Isaac Stanley and Clinton L. Leonard. He now rests from his labours leaving an assurance that he is enjoying a crown of life beyond. H.

SAN JOSE SCALE IN ORCHARDS

Pest Appearing in Fruit Trees in Allegany and Garrett Counties.

The destructive insect known as the San Jose Scale has been found in several orchards in the vicinity of McCoole, Md., and also at Swanton, Md. The centre of infection at McCoole seems to be in W. R. Walter's half grown orchard, where many of the trees were cut down before they had been inspected by Charles T. Sweet, state inspector for Garrett and Western Maryland counties, and before the real cause of the trouble was known. An effort will be made to stamp out the scale in that vicinity by concerted action on the part of the farmers and owners of orchards, and it is understood that a grange will be organized for that purpose. On Friday next, March 24th, at the Walter's orchard, a demonstration of properly spraying trees with a solution of lime, sulphur and salt will be given under the direction of Prof. Symons, Maryland State Entomologist, and in the afternoon a grange will be organized at the McCoole school house.

Notice of Letting the Contract for a Jail and Sheriff's Residence, for Garrett County, at It's County Seat, Oakland, Md.

Sealed proposals will be received by the Clerk of the County Commissioners of Garrett County, at Oakland, Md., for the furnishing of all materials and labor required for the erection and completion of a Jail and Sheriff's Residence according to the plans and specifications prepared by Holmboe & Lafferty, Architects, Clarksburg, W. Va., copies of which are now on file at the Commissioners' Office and at the office of the above named Architects.

Said proposals will be received until 2 o'clock P. M. on the 12th Day of April, 1905,

and will be opened the same day by the County Commissioners and as soon as the said proposals have been examined the said County Commissioners will take action towards the letting of the contract.

Each proposal must be accompaned by a certified check of twenty-five per cent. of its amount, or a surety bond for a like amount made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett county as a guarantee that the successful bidder will enter into a contract and furnish a bond double the amount of his bid.

This bond must be issued by a regular Surety Guarantee Co., and furnished within a reasonable time after the contract has been signed.

The said check or bond shall become forfeited to the County Commissioners if for any reason the successful bidder shall fail to enter into a contract and furnish the bond as aforesaid after its acceptance by the said County Commissioners.

This bond must be made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett County and the conditions of the said bond shall guarantee the faithful performance and execution of the work according to the plans and specifications on file as aforesaid.

After the contract has been signed and the bond approved the certified checks will be returned to their respective makers and if the contract is not awarded within two weeks from the opening of the bids the obligation of the bidders will cease and their checks returned.

Each bidder shall accompany his bid with samples of the material he intends to use for cell construction, with a full size sample of the grating 2 inches square, and samples of plates 4 inches square, also a model or full size drawing of the locking device with detail specifications covering its construction; also each bidder must accompany his bid with samples of the cut stone.

The County Commissioners will award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder and they reserve the right to reject one or all bids.

THE REVIEW

The early Church did well to select an eagle as the emblem of St. John. He soars high and sees far. The product of his pen is the most valuable portion of the Bible. It has been called the gospel of eternity and the heart of Christ. His style is unique. He does not attempt a minute or chronological narrative. His whiting is an argument. He states a proposition and addresses himself to the maintaining of it. His purpose is to is to cause the reader to believe that Jesus is the Christ. His method is to take some scenic incidents and typical persons and report that Jesus' words in connection with them so that there may be reciprocal illumination. He calls the readers to a halt that he may reflect, he epitomizes the argument, makes application, and before he closes swings the golden censer of praise to God.

Peculiar interest attaches to John's person as well as to his writing. An incident illustrates his character. It may, of course, be apocryphal, but Eusebius and Clement both affirm it to be true. The apostle left a young man in care of a certain bishop to be instructed. On his next visit he surprised the bishop by asking for his "deposit." The bishop denied that he had any "deposit," supposing St. John meant money. Then the apostle said, "I demand the young man." The bishop reluctantly admitted that he had allowed the catechumen to apostatize, and that he had become a robber chief. The apostle mounted a horse and put himself in the way of being captured by the robber in order that he might reclaim him. And in this he is said to have succeeded. If this tradition and others like it are true, sacred art has done an injustice to St. John when it has pictured him as effeminate. He was, in fact, a bundle of paradoxes: a fisherman, yet having social access to the high priest's palace; a Galilean, yet intimately familiar with Judea; of none of the schools, yet penning the noblest thing in literature; gentle, yet a son of thunder.

John's Gospel is the oral teaching of his whole ministry reduced to writing. It is a restatement of apostolic doctrine by the last living apostle. It is not a mere supplement to the other Gospels. He did not merely bring up the rear for the purpose of gleaning what others had passed by. He takes great scenic events, six miracles (or signs, as he significantly calls them) and three parables. He gives the setting and background of each and then interprets, or, better, makes the Lord His own interpreter by recording His saying in the connection. Thus, by a series of clusters of sayings, deeds, and events, he makes what Origen did not hesitate to call "the main Gospel."

There is not in literature a finer example of adaptation of style of subject. The noblest and profoundest thought is here clothed in language ample and royal. What she Sistine frescoes are in art, the exordium of the fourth Gospel is to written speech. Yet with all its stateliness there is an inherent simplicity. The similarity between the opening of the Book of Genesis and the opening of this Gospel will be readily recognized. The prologue is in the form of Hebrew poetry, which consists largely of the recurrence of previously expressed thoughts with altered phrase and added meaning.

John the Evangelist paints a noble and fadeless portrait of John the Baptist. He was intensely human. He had like passions to those of other men. The glory of it is that with these he yet acted divinely in a great national crisis. And that not because irresistibly impelled by a power external to himself. His ascetic life was a rational protest to the voluptuousness of his age. His solitariness rebuked the self-interested combinations in Church and State. He sought the desert that he might think to a finish a patriotic course of conduct and might fortify his soul with those matured convictions of truth which would inure him even to martyrdom. When at length he felt he was ready to speak and some at least ready to hear he went to the place where the most people would naturally congregate.

Now follow two illuminating incidents—the calling of the first disciples and the working of the first miracle. To them attaches the natural interest in first things. Origins always fascinating. Every book of Genesis is attractive. This is the beginning of the Christian Church. The interest ordinarily attaching to the start of things is in this instance greatly enhanced by the sacred character of the institution, its phenomenal history, and its world-wide and beneficent effects.

The visit of Nicodemus to Jesus ought to be viewed in the light of events then transpiring. The breach between the officials of the Hebrew Church and the reforming rabbi had already begun. Nicodemus rose superior to the prejudice of his clique and visited the Teacher. Wonder is not that he came at night, but that he came at all. What nonpulsed Nicodemus was to be told that he could only come into the kingdom as the proselyte came into the Hebrew Church. He considered himself a charter member. To find that it was not a question of higher or lower seat, but of any seat at all, was what dumfounded him.

The scenes shift in this absorbingly interesting panorama. Jesus conversation with the woman at Jacob's well, to whom He makes His first categorical declaration of Messiahship. The healing of the nobleman's son is a history of the generation, growth, and fruitage of faith all in epitome. Jesus, at the Pool of Bethesda, is a picture of His sympathy and power. The event also marks the beginning of official hostility to Jesus.

There is a philosophic continuity in John's presentation of incidents which is far more effective than a bald chronological series. He does not do violence to chronology, but he is not hampered by it. His purpose is to show the evolution of Jesus' character and work. Next in this order comes the miracle of the loaves and fishes, followed by the appearance of Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles, and closing with the miracle of the healing of the man born blind. This latter miracle was like so many others, an acted parable. Jesus refused to enter with His disciples into the current and favorite speculation which summed itself in the question whether the man or his parents were sinners; whether the suffering was sign of sin, and the degree of it indicated the degree of the sin. He turned from splitting hairs to opening eyes. It pleased Him to condescend to the use of the crude materia medica of the day in order to strengthen the growing faith of the unfortunate man and to make the cure the more conspicuous. John's glowing narative gives us a dissolving view, fascinating and impressive. The pitiful mendicant fades away, and in his stead appears a glorious confessor witty and dauntless meet to be enrolled in the noble army of the faithful.

Dear Sir: Here's a paint that's being sold to bargain-hunters:

10 per cent lead
50 " " zinc
20 " " barytes
20 " " whiting

Barytes and whiting are sand and whitewash, not paint.

Some people must like gold bricks. The name of that is——"pure lead-and-zinc." The dealer who sells it says it's as good as Devoe.

Sheridan at Five Forks

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

March 30-April 1, 1865

[Copyright, 1905, by G. L. Kilmer.]

SHERIDAN reached the lines of the besieging army in front of Petersburg the 27th of March, 1865, bringing 13,000 cavalry from the Shenandoah valley. In anticipation of his arrival General Grant had ordered a movement of the infantry forces around the right flank of Lee's lines protecting the city. The object of this advance was to cut Lee's communications southward and if possible get between his army and Lynchburg.

Before the arrival of Sheridan the Army of the Potomac mustered 75,000 men for duty. Sheridan added 13,000, and 17,000 more were brought from the Army of the James, which confronted Richmond on the north side of the Appomattox, making a total in hand for the new movement of 105,000 and leaving a reserve before Richmond of 20,000. Lee had a total at Petersburg and Richmond of 57,000, spread over a defensive line twenty miles in length.

The several movements on the Federal left at Petersburg had crowded the Confederates back to one road running in a general direction southwest and lying between the Federal positions and Hatcher's run. Hatcher's run is a swampy stream and made a good barrier when defended at the fords. About thirteen miles west by south of Petersburg there is a good road crossing the run and leading to the South Side railroad. This railroad has Lynchburg and Danville connections and was of highest importance to Lee in Petersburg. At Five Forks this road was defended from the Federal positions by intrenchments, and at Dinwiddie Court House, five miles southeast, there were outposts and defenses to guard against a surprise at Five Forks. Sheridan and the corps of Warren, Wright and Humphreys moved together toward the Federal left, and Lee sent out General R. H. Anderson with detached divisions to cope with this strong force.

When General Lee learned of the presence of Sheridan on the Petersburg lines he promptly concentrated all of his available cavalry to co-operate with Anderson and placed General Fitz-Hugh Lee in command. Fitz Lee at the time was in front of Richmond with his own division and marched promptly to Five Forks. Early on March 30 the Confederate troopers with Lee rode out toward Dinwiddie Court House, which had been reached by Sheridan's advance. A sharp skirmish took place. Late that day Fitz Lee was joined by the cavalry divisions of General T. L. Rosser and General W. H. F. Lee, making a total of nearly 6,000 sabers in the corps. Lee retired his troopers to Five Forks, where General George E. Pickett, the hero of the famous charge at Gettysburg, arrived about the same time with nearly 7,000 infantry.

While Fitz Lee stood off the Federal advance with a cordon of sabers Pickett intrenched his infantry on a line extending about a mile east and west respectively of the junction of roads at Five Forks. The lines of cavalry extended still farther on each flank. During the 31st Sheridan's cavalry under the immediate command of General Wesley Merritt pressed close to Pickett's works on the direct front and engaged in considerable sharp fighting.

During the preliminary movements of the troops Sheridan had visited Grant at the headquarters of the army and received instructions to take command of the Fifth army corps and drive the enemy from Five Forks. General Pickett's works at Five Forks were ingeniously constructed to cover the forks of the roads and to protect nearly two miles of the White Oak road leading from Five Forks to Petersburg, which it was Lee's object to keep open.

Sheridan's plan of attack was to make a feint of turning the enemy's right flank close to the forks with cavalry while the Fifth infantry corps under General G. K. Warren stormed the intrenchments on the Confederate left by approaching the position diagonally and charging over the works and across the road at the same time.

The extreme end of Pickett's intrenched line was in the woods and could not be located within many hundred yards. The first and second divisions of Warren, marching by the flank, passed it, and the third and last division, which was also the smallest, led by Romayne B. Ayers, following the other two, received a galling fire from the Confederates posted behind the angle. Ayers quickly faced his reserve brigade toward the blazing guns. It was led by Colonel Frederick Winthrop of the Fifth New York, a cousin of Major Theodore Winthrop, the hero of Big Bethel. The brigade was composed entirely of New Yorkers. They charged at double quick, with Winthrop at their head. The Confederates had placed their best guns and men in the angle as a forlorn hope. It was defended gallantly, but Winthrop's soldiers plunged through the heavy fire poured on them and carried the works. Winthrop fell mortally wounded, the last brigade commander killed in the Army of the Potomac.

SHERIDAN'S MEN CHARGING PICKETT'S WORKS AT FIVE FORKS.

When General Pickett saw that his left flank had been broken by the Fifth corps he withdrew a brigade from the front line which faced the Federal cavalry, rallied the troops and guns driven from the captured angle and prepared to make a stand for the defense of his rear, which was in danger. This new line was quickly smashed by Warren's troops, and the Confederates moved down the line toward the forks.

Meanwhile General Devin's division of Federal cavalry moved to the attack on Pickett's direct front at Five Forks. Two mounted brigades of Custer's division charged at the same time upon the line held by W. H. F. Lee's mounted men. Custer delivered the attack with his usual dash, but Lee held his ground for a time. One of Devin's brigades broke over the Confederate works, capturing three guns of Pegram's battalion, with two battleflags and 1,000 prisoners.

In the fight with Devin the gallant boy colonel, Willie Pegram, fired his last shot. He fell beside his guns. Both General Pickett and Fitz Lee were absent from the front line when Warren sprung his fierce attack upon the angle. Owing to the density of the woods no sound of battle reached them. A courier notified Pickett that the fight was on, and, galloping down the road, he barely passed the angle when Warren's leading brigade broke through. Fitz Lee was cut off and waited inactive beyond Hatcher's run until his defeated troopers joined him.

At the close of the battle Sheridan relieved Warren of his command for the reason, as he alleged, that Warren had been dilatory in making attack and did not exert himself to inspire his troops while they were in action. Sheridan's victory at Five Forks cut Lee's direct communications between Petersburg and Lynchburg, but the line from Richmond to Danville and its Lynchburg connections remained intact.

Brains of Great Men Wanted.

An attempt is being made, says the Medical Record, to form a society which shall have for its object the education of the public to a realization of the advantages to science attending the study of the brains of illustrious personages. A committee of eminent psychologists has been appointed for the purpose of preparing a general form of brain bequest which will hold in law and not be rendered null by any action that may be taken by relatives of the person making the bequest.

The Powers of Love and Science

By MAURICE MAETERLINCK, German Author and Thinker

IT is well that men should be reminded that THE VERY HUMBLEST of them has the power of fashion, after a divine model, that he chooses not, a great moral personality composed in equal parts of himself and the ideal.

It is only in the depths of life that this great moral personality can be carved out, and only by means of INCESSANT REVELATIONS of the divine can we add to the stores of the ideal we require.

To every man is it given to attain IN SPIRIT to the heights of virtuous life and to know at all times what his conduct should be would he act like a hero or a saint. But more than this is needed. It is essential that the SPIRITUAL atmosphere about us should be transformed to such a degree that it ends by resembling the atmosphere of Swedenborg's beautiful countries of the age of gold, wherein the air permitted not a falsehood to leave the lips.

An instant comes then when the smallest ill that we fain would commit falls at our feet like a leaden ball upon a disk of bronze, WHEN EVERYTHING CHANGES, though we know it not, into beauty, love or truth.

* * *

But this atmosphere enwraps those only who have been heedful to ventilate their lives sufficiently by at times flinging open the gates of the other world. It is when we are near to those gates that we love, for to love one's neighbor does not mean only to give oneself to him, to serve, help and sustain others. We may possibly be neither good nor noble nor beautiful even in the midst of the greatest sacrifice.

THE NURSE WHO DIES BY THE BEDSIDE OF A TYPHOID PATIENT MAY PERHAPS HAVE A MEAN, RANCOROUS, MISERABLE SOUL.

To love one's neighbor in the immovable depths means to love in others that which is ETERNAL, for one's neighbor in the truest sense of the term is that which approaches the nearest to God—in other words, ALL THAT IS BEST AND PUREST IN MAN—and it is only by ever lingering near the gates I spoke of that you can discover the divine in the soul. Then will you be able to say with the great Jean Paul, "When I desire to love most tenderly one who is dear to me and wish to forgive him everything, I have but to look at him for a few minutes IN SILENCE."

TO LEARN TO LOVE ONE MUST FIRST LEARN TO SEE.

"I lived for twenty years by my sister's side," said a friend to me one day, "and I saw her for the first time at the moment of our mother's death." Here, too, it had been necessary that death should violently fling open an eternal gate SO THAT TWO SOULS MIGHT BEHOLD EACH OTHER in a ray of the primeval light. Is there one among us who has not near to him sisters he has never seen?

* * *

Happily, even in those whose vision is most limited there is always SOMETHING that acts IN SILENCE, as though they had seen. It is possible perhaps that to be good is only to be IN A LITTLE LIGHT what all are in darkness. Therefore, doubtless, it is well that we should endeavor to raise our life and should strive toward summits where ill doing becomes IMPOSSIBLE. And, therefore, too, it is well to accustom the eye to behold events and men in a divine atmosphere. But even that is not indispensable, and how small must the difference seem to the eyes of a God!

WE ARE IN A WORLD WHERE TRUTH REIGNS AT THE BOTTOM OF THINGS AND WHERE IT IS NOT TRUTH, BUT FALSEHOOD, THAT NEEDS TO BE EXPLAINED.

Those who think of nothing have the same truth as those who think of God. THE TRUTH IS A LITTLE FARTHER FROM THE THRESHOLD; that is all.

There are about us thousands and thousands of poor creatures who have nothing OF BEAUTY in their lives. They come, they go in obscurity, and we believe that all is dead within them, and no one pays any heed. And then one day a simple word, an unexpected silence, a little tear that springs from the source of beauty itself, tells us that THEY HAVE FOUND THE MEANS of raising aloft in the shadow of their soul an ideal a thousand times more beautiful than the most beautiful things their ears have ever heard or have their eyes ever seen.

A Poem for Today

THE WANDERER

By Eugene Field

UPON a mountain height, far from the sea,
I found a shell,
And to my listening ear this lonely thing
Ever a song of ocean seemed to sing—
Ever a tale of ocean seemed to tell.

How came the shell upon the mountain height?
Ah, who can say
Whether there dropped by some too careless hand—
Whether there cast when oceans swept the land,
Ere the Eternal had ordained the day?

Strange, was it not? Far from its native deep,
One song it sang:
Sang of the awful mysteries of the tide,
Sang of the restless sea, profound and wide—
Ever with echoes of the ocean rang.

And as the shell upon the mountain height
Sang of the sea,
So do I ever, leagues and leagues away—
So do I ever, wandering where I may,
Sing, O my home! sing, O my home! of thee!

Hans and His Friend

The German Cobbler Hears How Voglestein Was Swindled, and He Tells Him How to Drown His Sorrows.

I VHAS putting some lifts on der heels of a pair of shoes for der plumber der odder day und wishing I vhas so rich I could haf diamonds eafery day in der year vhen my frendt, Mr. Voglestein, vhalks in und looks aroundt me und says:

"Vhell, Hans, I see you vhas workin' avhay for nottings, der same ash all der time before. If you can't be some smart mans in America, vhy don't you go back to Shermany und raise some cabbage?"

Dot hurts my feelings, und I don't say nottings, und by und by he puts his hat on his ear und whistles und says:

"If somepody haf brains he vhas all right und can see Niagara falls eafery day in der week. If he haf some sawdust in his head he can see only mud-puddles in der road."

"But somepody who has brains vhas swindled sometimes," I says.

"Maype dot vhas so, but I like you to understand dot nottings happens to me. How could dey vhen my name vhas Voglestein? You talk like I vhas swindled eafery day in der week. Can't I shust drop in to see how you vhas mitout you belief I vhas swindled? For a man who haf some brain in his head you vhas werry suspicious."

Und he vhalks aroundt und whistles und sings und makes oudt how big a man he vhas. By and by, vhen I don't say somethings, he speaks:

"Sometimes I vhas swindled, of course, because I vhas greenhorns, but dot vhas long ago, vhen I first come to dis country. I shust like to see somepody come some gum games on me now. He vhill find a mans who can see through a brick wall mit a hole in her in two minutes."

I don't speak to him aboudt dot, und he goes oudt doors und comes in again und says:

"You tell me you vhas my frendt, und yet you vhas always believin' I vhas some fools. Humph! A great big frendt you vhas! Maybe I vhas a leetle child or a crazy mans dot I can't take care of myself, but I like to hear some one say so. You vhas der crazy mans. If you only do ash I tells you years ago you vhas some rich mans now. I advise und advise, but you sit like some bumps on a log, und all my advise vhas thrown avhay."

"Vhell, vhat haf you done dis time?" I ask as he smokes his pipe und keeps quiet.

"Ha, ha, ha!" he goes ash he slaps his leg und grows red in der face mit

HE SHUST WANTS TO DIE AND BE BURIED.

laughter. "So you vhill belief I vhas played for a sucker, eh? Vhell, my name vhas Voglestein, und I like to tell you dot you vhas mistook. I vhas shust $400 in my pocket, und don't you forget her. If you do forget her, he vhas badt for you."

"How vhas it?" I says. "If you haf made a good thing, I like to hear aboudt it. Do you find a pocketbook in der street car, or maype you safe a man's life from some ice wagon?"

"It vhas nottings of dot kind. It vhas business und speculation—sometings to call for brains. I make $400 all right, but if it vhas you you don't make 2 cents. Dot vhas der difference between Voglestein und Hans."

"Vhell?"

"Vhell, maype you know vhat gold vhas?"

"Of course."

"She comes oudt of der ground—out of a gold mine."

"So somepody tells me one day."

"Do you eafer hear of some town called Lame River?"

"Lame River? Lame River? I neifer hear of it in my life. Maype you mean Cripple Creek?"

"Dot vhas her. She vhas oudt west somewhere. How you come to know so much surprises me. Maype you vhas going to haf some brains in your old age. Dot Cripple Creek vhas der place vhere der gold vhass so plenty dot nopody can plant potatoes. Two days ago a strange man comes in my soda water works. He vhas pale und sick. He leans his head down on der table und sighs und groans. He vhants no soda water und no cigars. He shust vhants to die und be buried und haf no more to do mit dis wicked world. It vhas a sad, sad case."

"But you let him die, of course?" I says.

"Vhat! Not on my life, sir. Do you belief I vhas some heathens mit no feeling in my soul? I goes oafer und talks mit him und tries to cheer him oop, of course. By und by he tells me he vhas from dot Cripple Creek. He owns der biggest gold mine oudt dere. Ehe vhas worth ten million dollar. His name vhas Brown, und he comes east to sell some stock to his friends und meets mit nothing but ingratitude. One old schoolmate of his throws him downstairs vhen he asks him to buy."

"I see."

"Vhat you see? Vhas it a crime for some mans to own a gold mine und like to make his old schoolmate rich? Hans, don't you make me belief you vhas a fool."

"If I vhas some fools I can't help her. Go on mit your story."

"Vhell, don't speak dot vhay to me any more. Dot man vhas sick. Ingratitude makes him sick. He also loses his bank book vhen he falls downstairs, but he happens to haf some stock in his pocket. She vhas for $500, und here she vhas. She vhas in der Bully Boy Gold mine. How you like der looks of her, eh? Gaze on dot und remember dot my name vhas Voglestein."

"She vhas a nice looking bit of paper, Mr. Voglestein. How mooch you pay for her?"

"Vhell, you see dot mans like me because I vhas tender hearted und don't throw him oudt of my place und gif him a kick. He must go to a doctor, send some telegrams und pay his hotel bill. Dot stock vhas for $500, but if I gif him one hoonered I shall hold it two days. If he don't come back in two days, der stock vhas mine. Two days vhas gone und he don't come back."

"Und so der stock vhas yours?" I says.

"Shust so, Hans; shust so, und I vhas $400 ahead of der game. Maype you like to shake hands mit a man named Voglestein?"

"Maype I shall by and by. Do you know vhat dis stock vhas really worth?"

"She vhas worth $500 anyhow, und maype twice dot. You vhas my old frendt, but I can't sell her to you for less dan $500."

"Dot vhas too bad. I vhas going to offer you twenty-fife cents for it to paste up on der wall."

"How—how you mean?" gasped Mr. Voglestein.

"Two days ago der plumber sells stock like dot to der ragman for fife cents a pound. Ash we vhas old frendts I gif you twenty-fife cents to help you oudt. You know der vhay down to der river, don't you?"

"Of course, but vhat haf I got to do mit dot river?"

"It vhas a good place to jump into."

"Do—do you really belief dot man vhas some swindlers?"

"I can prove her by three men. He don't own some gold mine. He vhasn't sick. He shust put oop some jobs on you, und you vhas tooken in. If you don't like to shump into der river, vhy not turn on der gas in your room und be found dead in der morning?"

"So—so I vhas swindled?" says Mr. Voglestein ash he stands oop mit his face ash white ash flour.

"You vhas. Mr. Voglestein, shake hands mit Hans, der German cobbler. We vhas old frendts, und I shall see to your funeral arrangements. I 'spose you like to be buried head downwards?"

He tries to say sometings, but he can't. He shust stands und looks red und white und waves his arms aboudt. I stand oop und pat him on der head und smooth him down der back, und den I take him by der arm und lead him to der door und put him oudt. He looks back at me mit tears in his eyes, und den he limps slowly avhay und goes aroundt der corner, und I see him no more.

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

As promised in my last "jottings" to give a full account of gross receipts of all crops raised on the famous "Altamont Springs Farm" and the cost of producing same showing the net income, etc., a letter from the manager states that the audit is not complete, but in connection with products of this fram I am informed that it furnishes large quantities of buck wheat flour and potatoes for the Washington market beside shipping in the last four months three car loads of Altamont spring water, containing over seven thousand five hundred gallons, and the demand for this pure medicinal water increasing with each order. The manager's meanderings on his late pleasant visit, with Col. Truesdell's complimentary position in the Inaugural parade will be given later.

We were pleased to inspect the three large ware rooms of Messrs. Walter Bros. of this place and were astonished to find some three car loads of machinery of every variety which farmers use. Mowers by the dozen, with reapers, hay rakes, buggies of all kinds, wagons of different makes, plows, with all the parts and fixtures in case of breakage, and in a word the many farmers and lumber friends of this genial and enterprising firm can get any thing from a lawn mover to a reaper and at prices to compete with any firm in Garrett county. We congratulate these friends who have built an up-to-date shop and three large ware room so as to display their wares where they can be inspected with no trouble to patrons.

We were both grieved and shocked on Thursday of last week to hear of the unexpected and sad death of the young wife of Mr. Edward Grim, leaving on interesting little family of four bright children. Mrs. Grimm died at Dodson, on the W. Va. C. & P. R. R., this county, on Wednesday of last week and was intered in the Deer Park cemetery, Rev. Percy W. Metheny officiating. A large concourse of friend and and relatives from Oakland, Mt. Lake and this place and vicinity, paid the last sad tribute of respect to this devoted wife and mother.

Rev. E. Manges is conducting a series of meetings at his church this week and Sabbath last some acquisitions were made in membership with more to join in the near future. Rev. The box supper at the Town Hall Friday night for the benefit of the M. E. church in purchasing a new organ, was a grand success in spite of the inclement weather and muddy roads. As our country friends could not get in to attend, yet the neat sum of over $30 was realized, after paying all expenses, and with this nucleus we are sure friends will come to the aid of these noble young ladies and help them get an organ that will contrast with their new and well appointed church edifice.

Our young friend, Mr. Wilford Chadderton, returned from Baltimore yesterday and reported his brother workman, Mr, Wm. B. Miller, well and getting along nicely at his trade as foreman for Walsh & Co., in building up the burned district of the metropolis of Maryland.

Specht made a hurried trip to McHenry yesterday and reports the roads as almost impassible, but says he is glad he went so as to get back his daughter and her aunt who have been visiting at that place the past two week. Mr. Specht says "baching" don't suit him, hence this hasty trip to his native heath.

TRUSTEES' SALE
OF VALUABLE
Real Estate
On BEAR CREEK, Garrett County, Maryland.

Under and by virtue of a decree of the Circuit Court of Garrett County, sitting in Equity, dated the 22nd day of March, 1905, and passed in a cause standing as No. 1321 Equity on the docket of said court, wherein Frederick Kamp et al. are complainants, and Henrietta Kamp et al. are defendants, the undersigned trustees appointed by said decree hereby give notice that they will on Saturday, the 15th Day of April, 1905,

At the hour of eleven o'clock a. m., of said day, in front of the Postoffice, in the town of Oakland, Maryland, offer at public auction to the highest bidder all those two lots or tracts of land situated, lying and being in Garrett County, Maryland, known and designated as

Military Lots Nos. 2620 and 2624,

Containing fifty acres each, lying on the north prong of Bear Creek near Engles Mill.

These lands are covered with virgin forest consisting of Oak and other hard woods and the timber is valuable.

Also all that other tract of land the same being part of the tract of land called

The Rights of Man, Second Part,

Which is fully described in a deed for the same from William C. Pennington, trustee, to Henry Kamp, dated the 24th day of February, 1880, containing 172 acres, more or less, of which land, however, the said Henry Kamp in his lifetime conveyed to Frederick Kamp the quantity of 122 acres, leaving a balance of

42 Acres

To be sold as aforesaid. This land also lies on the north prong of Bear Creek aforesaid and is partly covered with timber. The minerals underlying said land will be offered separately from the timber and surface, and the timber may be offered separately from the surface, which ever in the judgment of the said trustees will be for the best interests of the parties concerned.

TERMS OF SALE—As prescribed by the decree, one-third cash on the day of sale, one-third in six months and one-third in twelve months from the day of sale, the deferred payments to bear interest from the day of sale, and to be secured to the satisfaction of the trustees, or the entire purchase money may be paid in cash, at the option of the purchaser or purchasers.

Gertrude C. Jeffers, who sues by her husband and next friend, Alpheus M. Jeffers, Alpheus M. Jeffers, Addie Warnick, trustee, Beryl Warnick, Hazel Warnick and Beulah Warnick, infants, who sue by their next friend, George Warnick, and George Warnick, plaintiffs, v. Albert Warnick, Edward E. Warnick, Ida R. Duckworth and Stephen A. Duckworth, her husband, John C. Brydon, Louis B. Brydon and Gilmor S. Hamill, defendants.

No. 1328 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett county, Maryland.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree for the sale of Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, containing fifty acres each, situate, lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, and for a distribution of the proceeds thereof amongst the parties to this cause in proportion to their several interests.

The bill states that the said Gertrude C. Jeffers, Addie Warnick, trustee, for the use and benefit of her three infant children, the said Beryl Warnick, Hazel Warnick and Beulah Warnick, George Warnick, Albert Warnick, Edward E. Warnick and Ida R. Duckworth are each seized and possessed in fee simple of an undivided one seventh interest in and to said Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, and that a certain Truman P. Warnick was likewise seized and possessed of an undivided one-seventh interest in the said lands, the derivation of title to said respective interests being fully set forth in the several exhibits filed with said bill; and that the said Truman P. Warnick, on the 15th day of February, 1902, executed and delivered to the defendant, Gilmor S. Hamill, a mortgage upon his undivided one-seventh interest, and that having defaulted in the payment of the debt secured by said mortgage, on the 18th day of February, 1905, the said Hamill, mortgagee, exercised the power of sale contained in said mortgage and sold the interest of the said Truman P. Warnick in said lands to John C. Brydon and Louis B. Brydon to the extent of one-half of said undivided one-seventh interest, and to himself, the said Gilmor S. Hamill, to the extent of one-half of said undivided one-seventh interest, and duly reported said sale to this Court in a cause standing as No. 1315 Equity on the docket of said court as appears by the exhibit filed with said bill relating to said proceedings.

The bill further states that the plaintiffs together with the defendants are seized and possessed it fee simple, as tenants in common of the aforesaid Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, and that the parties to this suit above named are the only persons interested in said lands; that said real estate is not susceptible of partition without material loss and injury to the parties interested therein, and that in order to make division of said interests and more especially to protect and advance the interests of said infant children, it will be necessary that said real estate be sold and the proceeds thereof divided amongst the parties according to their several interests.

That the said Louis B. Brydon is a non-resident of the State of Maryland; that all the other parties to this cause reside within the State of Maryland, and that all of said parties are adults with the exception of the three infants above named.

The bill then prays for a decree for the sale of said real estate, a distribution among the parties according to their respective interests and for general relief, process and an order of publication.

It is thereupon, the 16th day of March, 1905, by the Circuit Court for Garrett county, in Equity, ordered, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper, published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 15th day of April, 1905, give notice to the said absent defendant of the object and substance of this bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor on or before the 1st day of May next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

CIRCUIT COURT TERM ENDED THIS MORNING

A Session Held Last Night In Order to Close Proceedings.

PRISONERS SENTENCED YESTERDY

Three Sent to the Penitentiary and One to the House of Correction—Other Proceedings—Damage Suit Against City of Cumberland.

This morning at two o'clock after the jury which had been empaneled to sit in the case of Sanders vs. the City of Cumberland, had rendered its verdict, giving the plaintiff $1,000, the September Term of Court was closed by Clerk E. Z. Tower, under instructions from the Court.

The case above referred to was removed from the Allegany Circuit Court to this court, the City of Cumberland being the defendant in a suit brought by a Mrs. Sanders, of that city, who sued to recover damages to the amount of $25,000, her claim being based upon the grounds that the city had been negligent in allowing a pile of lumber to be carelessly piled along one of its streets and while her little child was passing along the pavement the lumber fell upon the child and its death ensued. The case was tried before a jury which brought in a verdict for $1,000 as above recited.

Yesterday morning His Honor Judge Henderson passed sentence upon those found guilty on criminal charges, the sentences being as follows:

James D. Uphole, incest, three years in the Penitentiary.

Nelson Wilt, arency, three years in the Penitentiary.

George Burkholder, larency, one year in the Penitentiary.

Charles Hackney, larency, one year in the House of Correction.

On Friday last the Grand Jury made its report and was discharged, the report appearing elsewhere in this paper.

During the past week the following matters were disposed of by the court:

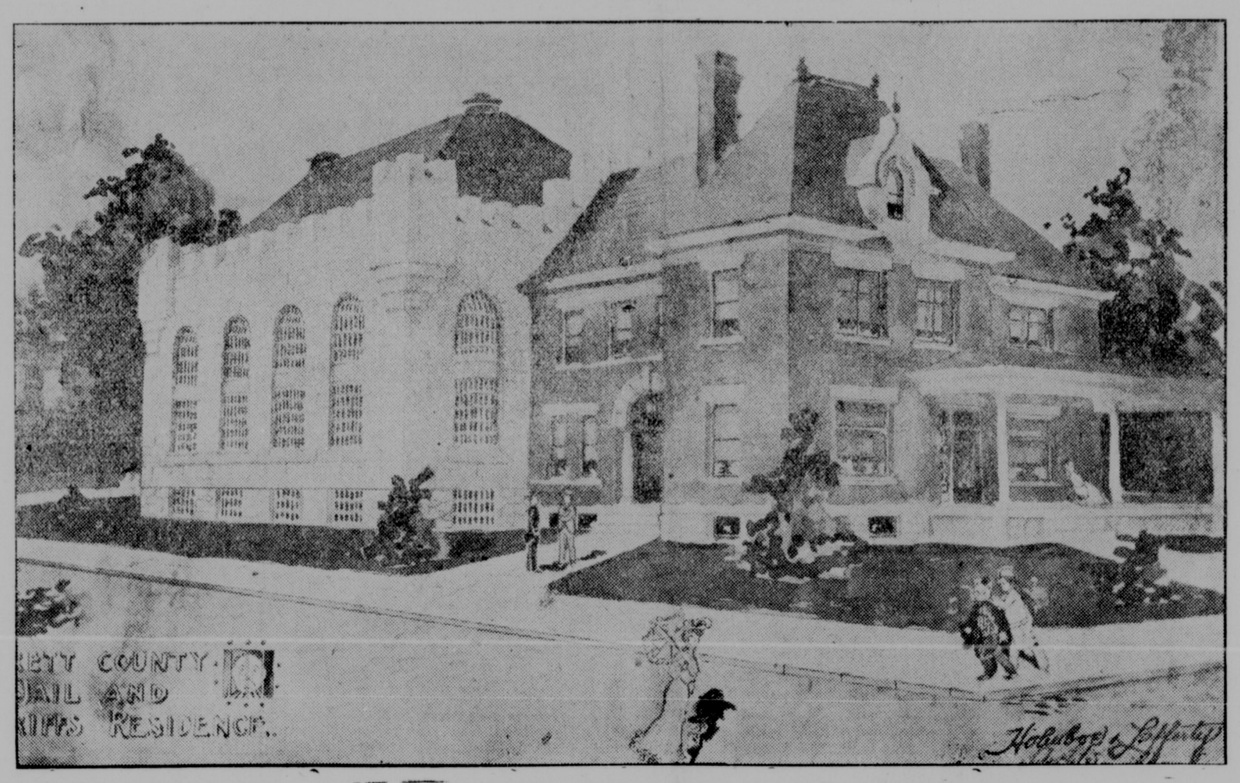
PROPOSED NEW JAIL AND SHERIFF'S RESIDENCE TO BE ERECTED IN OAKLAND.



The above is a faithful representation of the proposed new jail and sheriff's residence to be erected in Oakland, the contract for which has been advertised to be let by the Board of County Commissioners on April 12th next.

The following description of the proposed building is taken from the specifications on file in the Commissioners' office:

Jail building is 42x61 feet; sheriff's residence, 41x42 feet, the latter of select brick, while the jail proper is cut stone laid in regular range courses, of a Romanesque design. The structure will be slate roofed, heavy foundations, heated by steam and with hot and cold water throughout. The jail will contain thirty-two cells of the following dimensions: Twenty-seven cells 5x7 feet; one dungeon, 5x7 feet; two detention cells for children 7x10 feet; one hospital cell 13x17 feet; one women's department cell 13x17 feet, and a consultation booth for convicts' friends or attorneys. The floors will be cemented and a large portion of the inside walls will be of chrome or tool-proof steel, absolutely burglar defying. The basement will be so designed that cells may be installed therein at any time. The cell doors will be so arranged that all may be opened or closed from the outer corridor or any particular one, two or three may be opened or closed without entering the jail proper. The corridor within the jail is designed to afford exercise for the prisoners and is four feet from the outer wall at all points. The entire plumbing is concentrated in an utility corridor and is at all times open to the immediate investigation of plumbers should their services be required.

The building will be ventilated by an improved indirect type, the same being deemed the most efficient for the purpose. Special care has been given the sanitation throughout, each cell being provided with its separate arrangement in this respect. Shower and tub baths are also provided in the plans for the use of prisoners.

A dumb waiter runs from the kitchen to each floor for the purpose of facilitating the feeding of persons confined in the jail.

The sheriff's residence contains a general office, private office for jailer, reception hall, parlor, dining room, kitchen for jail and also one for the sheriff with all appointments, such as commodious storage pantries, etc., on the first floor. On the second floor three chambers for the sheriff's family a large room for jury or the turnkey, small bed room and bath room have been provided. The attic is left unfinished for the present.

The probable cost of the structure complete will be in the neighborhood of $40,000.

MARYLAND DAY IN THE OAKLAND PUBLIC SCHOOL

Was Fittingly and Patriotically Celebrated Last Friday.

SEN. WELLINGTON WAS ORATOR

And Delighted a Large Audience of Scholars and Patrons—Exercises Were Held in the Opera House—Collection for Statue Was $14.75.

Last Friday, the 24th inst., in accordance with the proclamation issued by Governor Warfield, "Maryland Day," commemorating the landing of Cecelius Calvert, and the separation of State and Church in Colonial Maryland, was very beautifully and patriotically celebrated by the public schools and friends of education in Oakland, when the published program was faithfully carried out, the exercises being conducted in the opera house, where a large audience gathered to hear Senator Wellington, the orator of the day, and the local talent who took part in the program.

Senator Wellington arrived here from his home in Cumberland about 9:30 o'clock, being met at the station by the committee of reception and from thence escorted to the Commercial Hotel in front of which he joined in the procession of scholars from the school building to the opera house. The pupils had been formed into a column, and with a large number of National and State flags unfurled made a very beautiful appearance to the on-looker. The several grades were under the immediate charge of the respective teachers in the school, Principal McBee heading the procession on the march.

At the opera house the program was carried out and included singing, reading of essays and recitations and an oration on "Religious Toleration in Maryland," which was delivered by Senator Wellington in his usual forceful and masterly style. The address was attentively listened to by the large audience present which filled every nook in the building and at its close the orator was roundly applauded.

The collection taken for the purpose of adding to the fund for the erection of a statue to Lord Baltimore amounted to $14.75, which has been forwarded to the proper person by Principal McBee.

Schools to Close.

The public schools of Garrett county will close on Friday, April 7th, and according to the school law separate reports for the five days of April will be required from all teachers. All schools which have been closed by order of the board of health or by the School Board will be allowed to make up lost time by making application to and receiving permission from the School Commissioners.

$1000 WORTH OF LEATHER DAILY.

This is the Amount Wanted by a Boston Firm from Garrett Leather Co.

A Dangerous Acquaintance

By WILLIS EMERY

Copyright, 1904, by Charles B. Etherington

THREE flights of stairs, steep and uneven, led up to Stephen Churchill's studio. They presented serious difficulties, especially on a hot afternoon, to so plump a man as John Gregory, art editor of the Traveler, and he paused at the head of the second flight and vainly tried to fan himself with a soft alpine hat.

He was somewhat sensitive in regard to his weight, and so he made a thin excuse for this halt, pretending that he had something to say to his companion, a brown eyed girl in a white dress.

"Remember," said he as impressively as he was able with the breath that was in him, "remember that I am not responsible for Steve Churchill. He is a good artist and a bad man—a dangerous man."

"We have flirtatious men at home," said she. "In that respect Mr. Churchill will not be a novelty. But we have no men there who could have painted 'The Cliff's Edge.' It is Mr. Churchill, the artist, whom your little country cousin wants to meet. Lead on, Jack, when you get your breath."

"I despise these fellows who pursue every pretty face," he began.

"Perhaps he won't think I'm pretty," said she demurely. "Besides, I'll tell him right away that I'm engaged."

"Well, that may do some good," muttered Gregory, "as the sailor said when he dropped an anchor with no cable fastened to it."

There were other visitors in Churchill's studio when Gregory and his cousin entered, and in the midst of them stood the artist at his easel, hard at work. He was a man of unimpressive appearance except for his air of earnestness. He had blue eyes and light brown hair, a clear skin and a fairly good figure—altogether a commonplace young man whose looks did not give the smallest suggestion of his ability unless one happened to remember that "genius is the capacity for taking infinite pains." Churchill certainly had the facial expression which would fit that definition.

He did not lay down his palette when Gregory introduced him to "the country cousin," and he seemed to take no especial interest in her except at the mention of the fact that she was an artist. Then he looked at her sympathetically, as if Gregory had said that she suffered from some chronic and painful ailment. Immediately he returned to his work without offering an apology, but for several minutes he continued to converse with Gregory and Miss Talbot, wandering ever farther away from them until his voice seemed to become inaudible in the far background of the landscape on the easel.

Helen Talbot laughed softly all the way down the three flights of stairs, and her enjoyment was the greater because of Gregory's extraordinary muttering and head shaking.

HE LOOKED AT HER SYMPATHETICALLY.

"I'll tell you what's a fact, Helen," he said as they came out upon the sidewalk, "something has struck Steve Churchill. I never saw him act like that before."

"Dangerous, dangerous man!" laughed the girl. "Where on earth did you get that idea of him?"

"The thing that makes me afraid for you, Helen," said he, "whether it's a question of trolley cars, express wagons or unprincipled men, is that you treat peril by the faith cure and deny its existence."

"And you imagine its existence," she retorted. "But, seriously, Jack," she added, "I am tremendously obliged to you for taking me to see Mr. Churchill. I have paid $100 for a course of lessons and have learned less from it than I learned from the pictures in that studio and from the man himself at work."

"Churchill not only has individual method," said Gregory, "but he has all kinds of method. You can't help picking up something that will help you. However, I'm interested in the man just now, not in the artist. What the dickens has come over him?"

Helen offered no solution of the problem, and presently they parted. A few days later the girl appeared in the art department of the Traveler, and every artist looked over the top of his drawing board while she was passing through the room. Indeed they never failed to do so. It would have been possible for Helen to deny them this pleasure by taking a somewhat longer route to her cousin's room—perhaps a dozen yards longer, involving the loss of several seconds—but she always convinced herself that she was in a hurry. Admiration is of course pleasant to a pretty girl, and there is no reason why she should go out of her way to avoid it.

"I've learned that Mr. Churchill has a class of art," said she. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"It slipped my mind," answered Gregory, frowning at a drawing.

"Well," said Helen, "I've joined it."

Gregory settled down a little farther into his chair.

"Mr. Churchill is a great natural teacher," the girl continued, "but he discourages me."

"Why?" inquired Gregory.

"Because he evidently does not think I have any ability," she replied. "He gives me all the attention I could ask, but it is perfectly obvious that he does so because his conscience compels him."

"Churchill's conscience!" muttered Gregory.

"By the way," said Helen, "I asked some of the other pupils whether they had noticed any change in him, and they hadn't. But none of them knew him very well."

"No," said Gregory. "I guess they didn't."

"It certainly seems to me," persisted Helen, "that Mr. Churchill has something on his mind. He talks to me as if he didn't see me at all. I should think he was looking at somebody standing behind me. Do you suppose he can have met with any misfortune?"

"None that he doesn't deserve," growled Gregory.

Helen rose from her chair with the air of one who has reached the limit of patience.

"Well, it's not very flattering," said she, "and I'd like to know what it means. However," she added after a momentary pause, "I'm bound to say that so far as I can see he treats all the other girls just the same way."

"Churchill always had an indifferent manner," responded Gregory. "It's not that that makes me think him changed. There seems to be a new purpose in the fellow, an energy and an ambition that I never saw before. Upon my word, I could almost believe that he has been caught at his own game and that some girl has made a dent in his vulcanized rubber heart."

"The same notion occurred to me," said Helen. And presently she went away without having given any satisfactory reason why she had called.

It may have been about two weeks later that Helen happened to be in the vicinity of Churchill's studio about an hour before the time for the assembling of the class. It seemed better to wait in the studio than anywhere else that she could think of at the moment. Doubtless some of the other pupils would arrive early and keep her company. Churchill himself would be no company at all, as she had already learned. He would attend strictly to his work and forget her existence.

Upon this occasion, however, the artist was not at work, or, to be more exact, he was not at his usual task. He sat by a desk upon which were many letters which he had written. When Helen entered he looked at her for some seconds intently, as if trying to bring his mind to her from some remote region.

"How do you do?" said he in a far-away voice. And then when she was seated he resumed his place at the desk and slowly tore all the letters into very small pieces. Afterward he put something which looked like a locket or very small metal picture frame into a drawer of the desk and turned the key upon it.

"Mr. Churchill," said she, "I have been talking with my cousin about you."

"Yes?" he responded, with only the faintest show of interest.

"He finds you greatly changed," said the girl.

Immediately a very obvious and surprising change revealed itself in the man. He rose with energy, and his eyes grew bright.

"I have good reason," he said.

She smiled and pointed to the drawer in the desk.

Churchill hesitated and then slowly turned. He opened the drawer and took from it something which the girl could not see until he held it toward her. It was, as she had guessed, a small round frame of plain gold containing a face cut from a photograph, the face of a very pretty girl, yet not such a girl as might be expected to accomplish a great and beneficial change in a man like Churchill.

To be honest about it, she looked vain and silly. As a mat for a genius she might fulfill the doleful traditions in regard to this subject, but youth always fights against tradition. Certainly Helen rebelled at the thought that such a doll should sway the destinies of a man whose most commonplace idea and lowliest aspiration she must always be totally unable to appreciate.

"Isn't she lovely?" she exclaimed. "Blue eyes, of course, like yours. How odd!"

"It's odd that any girl should care a penny for me," responded Churchill, relapsing into his former manner. "I'm not worth it."

He began to pace restlessly up and down the studio, in which exercise he was interrupted by the entrance of some members of his class.

It may have been a month after this that Helen came early to the studio again, but this is not to say that she had never done so in the meantime. A peculiar fascination had brought her there more than once. Why so, save she surely did not know. Churchill never seemed particularly glad to see her, and their conversation was often depressing, though Helen always strove to lift it to the highest level of aspiration and artistic enthusiasm.

If she had any comprehensible purpose it was to put the man at his best. Really she was fighting against the doll's face in the gold frame, protesting against the ascendency of the worse side of Churchill's nature, for, after all, when a man leaves running after pretty faces and begins to run after one pretty face he is not much the better for the change. A man's higher nature should impel him to seek a suitable mate, a woman who can help him and in some measure comprehend him. It seemed to Helen almost a duty to show Churchill that not all pretty women were dolls; that one of them might possibly be a companion and even an equal in her own way.

SHE WAS STARING AT A PHOTOGRAPH.

Upon the day that has been mentioned Churchill was not looking his best. He was somewhat pale; he seemed to have grown older, and all the lines in his face were intensified. He greeted her with his customary indifference, and then it all suddenly fell away from him.

"Helen," said he—for she had permitted him that liberty with her name—"I am going to say goodby to you now before any one else comes, though I may see you again even after today."

"Goodby!" she echoed, amazed.

"I'm going away," he said hurriedly. "I'm going abroad—or somewhere. I'm all out of sorts—broken down. I can't work. I need a change."

"Why, what in the world is the matter?" she demanded.

He hesitated and then almost sprang to his desk. In another instant he had shown her the gold frame, empty.

"It's all over," said he. "Better for her—much better for her. And for me, perhaps—I don't know—there's been another influence—I'm not the same man."

"What influence"— she began.

He looked into her eyes. She started back.

"No, no!" she cried. "I did not mean to do this."

He smiled sadly and extended his hand.

"Goodby," said he.

In the moment that followed they both heard steps upon the stairs.

"In a few days you'll have forgotten all about it," said he. "I shall be gone"—

"No!" she cried. "I don't want you to go."

His hand closed tighter upon hers, and then some one knocked at the door.

At the close of the session of the class Helen went to the Traveler office. She wanted to see Gregory, whom she recognized as her best available mentor, and yet she had by no means decided to tell him what had happened. In fact, she did not know what really had occurred except that she had broken Churchill's engagement. Her own sentiments were in wild confusion. She seemed to be two different girls, one of whom still remained bound in honor and affection to the man who held her promise, while the other was whirling away into another part of the universe.

Gregory was not in his office, and no one seemed to know what had become of him. While waiting Helen could not be idle. She seized upon the portfolios of the department and ran through endless stores of portraits and scenes, as if in frantic search for something.

When Gregory entered she was rigid as stone, staring at a photograph which she held in her hand.

"Jack," said she, "who is this?"

He glanced over her shoulder.

"English beauty," he replied. "Used to be on the stage. Dead, poor girl."

"Dead?"

"Yes, three or four years ago. I thought I'd thrown the picture away."

"Jack," said she, "Mr. Churchill had this girl's picture in a frame. Was he ever engaged to her?"

"To her! Why, he never saw her. She was never in this country nor he abroad. He made a portrait of her once long ago for the Traveler."

"Why, he told me"—

"Yes," said Gregory, sitting down heavily. "He told you that you had interrupted a romance. Old game. Wish you'd informed me sooner. But you didn't think I knew enough to make it worth while."

"Jack," said she, "I'm going home,—no, I'll go somewhere else for a week or two, and then I'll go home and stay."

"That's my good little cousin," said he heartily. "I'm glad to hear it."

The Man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

CHAPTER IX.

NOTORIETY AND THE INGLORIOUS GOOD.

ONE of the chief puerilities of our time is the love of advertisement. To emerge from obscurity, to be in the public eye, to make oneself talked of—some people are so consumed with this desire that we are justified in declaring them attacked with an itch for publicity. In their eyes obscurity is the height of ignominy, so they do their best to keep their names in every mouth. In their obscure position they look upon themselves as lost, like shipwrecked sailors whom a night of tempest has cast on some lonely rock and who have recourse to cries, volleys, fire, all the signals imaginable, to let it be known that they are there. Not content with setting off crackers and innocent rockets many, to make themselves heard at any cost, have gone to the length of perfidy and even crime. The incendiary Erostratus has made numerous disciples. How many men of today have become notorious for having destroyed something of mark, pulled down—or tried to pull down—some man's high reputation; signaled their passage, in short, by a scandal, a meanness or an atrocity!

This rage for notoriety does not surge through cracked brains alone or only in the world of adventurers, charlatans and pretenders generally. It has spread abroad in all the domains of life, spiritual and material. Politics literature, even science, and, most odious of all, philanthropy and religion are infected. Trumpets announce a good deed done, and souls must be saved with din and clamor. Pursuing its way of destruction, the rage for noise has entered places ordinarily silent, troubled spirits naturally serene and vitiated in large measure all activity for good. The abuse of showing everything, or, rather, putting every thing on exhibition, the growing incapacity to appreciate that which chooses to remain hidden and the habit of estimating the value of things by the racket they make have come to corrupt the judgment of the most earnest men, and one sometimes wonders if society will not end by transforming itself into a great fair, with each one beating his drum in front of his tent.

Gladly do we quit the dust and din of like exhibitions to go and breathe peacefully in some faroff nook of the woods, all surprise that the brook is so limpid, the forest so still, the solitude so enchanting. Thank God there are yet these uninvaded corners! However formidable the uproar, however deafening the babel of merry andrews it cannot carry beyond a certain limit. It grows faint and dies away. The realm of silence is vaster than the realm of noise. Herein is our consolation.

Rest a moment on the threshold of this infinite world of inglorious good of quiet activities. Instantly we are under the charm we feel in stretches of untrodden snow, in hiding wood flowers, in disappearing pathways that seem to lead to horizons without bourn The world is so made that the engines of labor, the most active agencies, are everywhere concealed. Nature affects a sort of coquetry in masking her operations. It costs you pains to spy her out, ingenuity to surprise her, if you would see anything but results and penetrate the secrets of her laboratories. Likewise in human society the forces which move for good remain invisible, and even in our individual lives; what is best in us is incommunicable, buried in the depths of us And the more vital are these sensibilities and intuitions, confounding themselves with the very source of our being, the less ostentatious they are They think themselves profaned by exposure to the light of day.

There is a secret and inexpressible joy in possessing at the heart of one's being, an interior world known only to God, whence, nevertheless, come impulses, enthusiasms, the daily renewal of courage and the most powerful motives for activity among our fellowmen. When this intimate life loses in intensity, when man neglects it for what is superficial, he forfeits in worth all that he gains in appearance. By a sad fatality it happens that in this way we often become less admirable in proportion as we are more admired. And we remain convinced that what is best in the world is unknown there, for only those know it who possess it, and if they speak of it in so doing they destroy its charm.

There are passionate lovers of nature whom she fascinates most in byplaces, in the cool of forests, in the clefts of canyons, everywhere that the careless lover is not admitted to her contemplation. Forgetting time and the life of the world they pass days in these inviolate stillnesses, watching a bird build its nest or brood over its young or some little groundling at its gracious play. So to seek the good within himself one must go where he no longer finds constraint or pose or "gallery" of any sort, but the simple fact of a life made up of wishing to be what it is good for it to be, without troubling about anything else.

May we be permitted to record here some observations made from life? As no names are given they cannot be considered indiscreet.

In my country of Alsace, on the solitary route whose interminable ribbon stretches on and on under the forests of the Vosges, there is a stonebreaker whom I have seen at his work for thirty years. The first time I came upon him I was a young student setting out with swelling heart for the great city. The sight of this man did me good, for he was humming a song as he broke his stones. We exchanged a few words, and he said at the end: "Well, goodby, my boy! Good courage and good luck!" Since then I have passed and repassed along that same route, under circumstances the most diverse, painful and joyful. The student has finished his course, the breaker of stones remains what he was. He has taken a few more precautions against the seasons' storms, a rush mat protects his back, and his felt hat is drawn farther down to shield his face. But the forest is always sending back the echo of his valiant hammer. How many sudden tempests have broken over his bent back, how much adverse fate has fallen on his head on his house, on his country! He continues to break his stones, and coming and going I find him by the roadside, smiling in spite of his age and his wrinkles, benevolent, speaking above all in dark days—those simple words of brave men, which have so much effect when they are scanned to the breaking of stones.

It would be quite impossible to express the emotion the sight of this simple man gives me, and certainly he has no suspicion of it. I know of nothing more reassuring and at the same time more searching for the vanity which ferments in our hearts than this coming face to face with an obscure worker who does his task as the oak grows and as the good God makes his sun to rise, without asking who is looking on.

I have known, too, a number of old teachers, men and women who have passed their whole life at the same occupation, making the rudiments of human knowledge and a few principles of conduct penetrate heads sometimes harder than the rocks. They have done it with their whole soul throughout the length of a hard life in which the attention of men had little place. When they lie in their unknown graves no one remembers them but a few humble people like themselves, but their recompense is in their love. No one is greater than these unknown.

How many hidden virtues may one not discover—if he know how to search—among people of a class he often ridicules without perceiving that in so doing he is guilty of cruelty, ingratitude and stupidity! I mean old maids. People amuse themselves with remarking the surprising dress and ways of some of them—things of no consequence, for that matter. They persist also in reminding us that others, very selfish, take interest in nothing but their own comfort and that of some cat or canary upon which their powers of affection center, and certainly these are not out done in egoism by the most hardened celibates of the stronger sex. But what we oftenest forget is the amount of self sacrifice hidden modestly away in so many of these truly admirable lives. Is it nothing to be without home and its love, without future, without personal ambition? to take upon oneself that cross of solitary life so hard to bear, especially when there is added the solitude of the heart? to force oneself and have no other interest than the care of the old, of orphans the poor, the infirm—those whom the brutal mechanism of life casts out among its waste? Seen from without these apparently tame and lusterless lives rouse pity rather than envy. Those who approach gently sometimes divine sad secrets, great trials undergone, heavy burdens beneath which too fragile shoulders bend; but this is only the side of shadow.

We should learn to know and value this richness of heart, this pure goodness, this power to love, to console, to hope, this joyful giving up of self, this persistence in sweetness and forgiveness even toward the unworthy. Poor old maids! How many wrecked lives have you rescued, how many wounded have you healed, how many wanderers have you gently led aright, how many naked have you clothed, how many orphans have you taken in, and how many strangers who would have been alone in the world but for you—you who yourself are often remembered of no one. I mistake. Some one knows you: It is that great mysterious Pity which keeps watch over our lives and suffers in our misfortunes. Forgotten like you, often blasphemed, it has confided to you some of its heavenliest messages, and that perhaps is why above your gentle comings and goings we sometimes seem to hear the rustling wings of ministering angels.

The good hides itself under so many different forms that one has often as much pains to discover it as to unearth the best concealed crimes. A Russian doctor who had passed ten years of his life in Siberia, condemned for political reasons to forced labor, used to find great pleasure in telling of the generosity, courage and humanity he had observed, not only among a large number of the condemned, but also among the convict guards. For the moment one is tempted to exclaim, "Where will not the good hide away!" And, in truth, life offers here great surprises and embarrassing contrasts. There are good men, officially so recognized, quoted among their associates—I had almost said guaranteed by the government or the church—who can be reproached with nothing but dry and hard hearts, while we are astonished to encounter in certain fallen human beings the most genuine tenderness and, as it were, a thirst for self devotion.

I should like to speak next, apropos of the inglorious good, of a class that today it is thought quite fitting to treat with the utmost one sidedness. I mean the rich. Some people think the last word is said when they have stigmatized that infamy, capital. For them, all who possess great fortunes are monsters gorged with the blood of the miserable. Others, not so declamatory, persist, however, in confounding riches with egoism and insensibility. Justice should be visited on these errors, be they involuntary or calculated. No doubt there are rich men who concern themselves with nobody else, and others who do good only with ostentation. Indeed, we know it too well. But does their inhumanity or hypocrisy take away the value of the good that others do and that they often hide with a modesty so perfect?

I knew a man to whom every misfortune had come which can strike us in our affections. He had lost a beloved wife, had seen all his children buried one after another. But he had a great fortune, the result of his own labor. Living in the utmost simplicity, almost without personal wants, he spent his time in searching for opportunities to do good and profiting by them. How many people he surprised in flagrant poverty, what means he combined for relieving distress and lighting up dark lives, with what kindly thoughtfulness he took his friends unawares, no one can imagine. He liked to do good to others and enjoy their surprise when they did not know whence the relief came. It pleased him to repair the injustices of fortune, to bring tears of happiness in families pursued by mischance. He was continually plotting, contriving, machinating in the dark, with a childish fear of being caught with his hand in the bag. The greater part of these fine deeds were not known till after his death; the whole of them we shall never know.

He was a socialist of the right sort, for there are two kinds of them. Those who aspire to appropriate to themselves a part of the goods of others are numerous and commonplace. To belong to their order it suffices to have a big appetite. Those who are hungering to divide their own goods with men who have none are rare and precious, for to enter this choice company there is need of a brave and noble heart free from selfishness and sensitive to both the happiness and unhappiness of its fellows. Fortunately the race of these socialists is not extinct, and I feel an unalloyed satisfaction in offering them a tribute they never claim.

I must be pardoned for dwelling upon this. It does one good to offset the bitterness of so many infamies, so many calumnies, so much charlatanism, by resting the eyes upon something more beautiful, breathing the perfume of these stray corners where simple goodness flowers.

A lady, a foreigner, doubtless little used to Parisian life, just now told me with what horror the things she sees here inspire her—these vile posters, these "yellow" journals, these women with bleached hair, this crowd rushing to the races, to dance halls, to roulette tables, to corruption—the whole flood of superficial and mundane life. She did not speak the word Babylon, but doubtless it was out of pity for one of the inhabitants of this city of perdition.

"Alas, yes, madam; these things are sad, but you have not seen all."

"Heaven preserve me from that!"

"On the contrary, I wish you could see everything, for, if the dark side is very ugly, there is so much to atone for it. And, believe me, madam, you have simply to change your quarter or observe it at another hour. For instance, take the Paris of early morning. It will offer much to correct your impressions of the Paris of the night. Go see, among so many other working people, the street sweepers, who come out at the hour when the revelers and malefactors go in. Observe beneath these rags those caryatid bodies, those austere faces! How serious they are at their work of sweeping away the refuse of the night's revelry! One might liken them to the prophets at Ahasuerus' gates. There are women among them, many old people. When the air is cold they stop to blow their fingers and then go at it again. So it is every day. And they, too, are inhabitants of Paris.

"Go next to the faubourgs, to the factories, especially the smaller ones, where the children or the employers labor with the men. Watch the army of workers marching to their tasks. How ready and willing these young girls seem as they come gayly down from their distant quarters to the shops and stores and offices of the city! Then visit the homes from which they come. See the woman of the people at her work. Her husband's wages are modest, their dwelling is cramped, the children are many, the father is often harsh. Make a collection of the biographies of lowly people, budgets of modest family life; loook at them attentively and long.

"After that go see the students. Those who have scandalized you in the streets are numerous, but those who labor hard are legion, only they stay at home and are not talked about. If you knew the toil and dig of the Latin quarter! You find the papers full of the rumpus made by a certain set of youths who call themselves students. The papers say enough of those who break windows, but why do they make no mention of those who spend their nights toiling over problems? Because it wouldn't interest the public. Yes, when now and then one of them, a medical student perhaps, dies a victim to professional duty the matter has two lines in the dailies. A drunken brawl gets half a column, with every detail elaborated. Nothing is lacking but the portraits of the heroes, and not always that.

"I should never end were I to try to point out to you all that you must go to see if you would see all. You would needs make the tour of society at large, rich and poor, wise and ignorant. And certainly you would not judge so severely then. Paris is a world, and here, as in the world in general, the good hides away while the evil flaunts itself. Observing only the surface, you sometimes ask how there can possibly be so much riffraff. When on the contrary, you look into the depths you are astonished that in this troublous, obscure and sometimes frightful life there can be so much virtue."

But why linger over these things? Am I not blowing trumpets for those who hold trumpet blowing in horror? Do not understand me so. My aim is this: To make men think about unostentatious goodness—above all, to make them love it and practice it The man who finds his satisfaction in things which glitter and hold his eyes is lost, first, because he will thus see evil before all else, then because he gets accustomed to the sight of only such good as seeks for notice, and therefore easily succumbs to the temptation to live himself for appearances. Not only must one be resigned to obscurity he must love it if he does not wish to slip insensibly into the ranks of figurants, who preserve their parts only while under the eyes of the spectators and put off in the wings the restraints imposed on the stage.

Here we are in the presence of one of the essential elements of the moral life. And this which we say is true not only for those who are called humble and whose lot it is to pass unremarked; it is just as true, and more so, for the chief actors. If you would not be a brilliant inutility, a man of gold lace and plumes, but empty inside, you must play the star role in the simple spirit of the most obscure of your collaborators. He who is nothing worth except on hours of parade is worth less than nothing. Have we the perilous honor of being always in view, of marching in the front ranks? Let us take so much the greater care of the sanctuary of silent good within us; let us give to the structure whose facade is seen of our fellow men a wide foundation of simplicity, of humble fidelity, and then, out of sympathy, out of gratitude, let us stay near our brothers who are unknown to fame. We owe everything to them, do we not? I call to witness every one who has found in life this encouraging experience—that stones hidden in the soil hold up the whole edifice. All those who arrive at having a public and recognized value owe it to some humble spiritual ancestors, to some forgotten inspirers. A small number of the good among them simple women, peasants, vanquished heroes, parents as modest as they are revered, personify for us beautiful and noble living; their example inspires us and gives us strength. The remembrance of them is forever inseparable from that conscience before which we arraign ourselves. In our hours of trial we think of them, courageous and serene, and our burdens lighten. In clouds they compass us about, these witnesses invisible and beloved who keep us from stumbling and our feet from falling in the battle, and day by day do they prove to us that the treasure of humanity is its hidden goodness.

Oakland, March 7th, 1905.

Grand Jury Report.

To the Honorable, the Judges of the Circuit Court for Garrett County:

The Grand Jurors for Garrett county having been in session for the past five days respectfully report that we examined all witnesses brought before us and carefully consider the evidence and where the evidence seemed to justify, indictments have been returned.

In the performance of our duties we have been greatly assisted and the business expedited by the advice and counsel of our able State's Attorney, Mr. F. A. Thayer.

As one of our duties it became necessary for us to inspect the court house, offices and the jail. We find the court house, as has been reported for years by former grand juries, totally inadequate and unfit for the needs and requirements of our rapidly increasing and growing county. The records we found kept with accuracy and neatness. We would recommend that the janitor of the court house be instructed to be more particular as to his duties, especially as to the stairway leading to the court room. We find that the vaults and safes for keeping records, plats, etc., totally inadequate, exposing the same to destruction by fire, dampness, or to be mutilated by any person maliciously inclined. The above applies especially to the office of the County Commissioners. We should consider it as criminal carelessness on the part of the County Commissioners if they continue to neglect providing suitable vaults or safes where all records, plats, etc., for the several offices can be kept safe from all damages from whatever source.

On our visit to the jail we found about twelve prisoners confined therein. The air on entering the prisoners' department of the jail was so foul and the stench so strong that a portion of the jury was nearly over come. We found a large portion of the prisoners on top of the steel cages seeking what little free air that could reach them through the small upper ventilators. While we we do not attribute the condition of the jail to the carelessness of the sheriff or jailer, but rather to imperfect drainage and bad ventilation, we must conclude that the same is totally unfit for human beings.

We commend the contemplated action of the County Commissioners in building a new jail and would suggest that great care and attention be given to selection of the site as to the proper drainage and sanitary conditions.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

A. G. STURGISS, Foreman.
J. H. MILLER, Clerk.

BITTINGER.

Work in the sugar camps in this section is rather dull thus far this season as the weather has not been favorable to any considerable run of sap.

Mr. Jonas Bittinger went to Grantsville last Monday on a marketing expedition.

Wheels have entirely displaced the runner as a means of travel and with a continuation of this fine weather the highways will soon be in good condition.

Dr. Robinson and Maud Bevans, of Grantsylle, drove through this village last Saturday afternoon.

Mrs. G. W. Engle who spent the winter season in Baltimore is expected home this week.

Miss Ada Beechy accompanied by Master Raymond Gnagey, were seen in town last Monday.

Rev. Shoup purchased a driving horse last Monday of ex-Treasurer Wm. M. Lohr.

Rev. Shoup and daughter expect to move into the new parsonage this week.

IMPROVING IN THE SOUTHLAND

Marked Condition For Better in Health of Col. George A. Pearre.

Postmaster William A. Pearre yesterday received a letter from Congressman George A. Pearre, who is sojourning in Pineville, S. C., for the benefit of his health. The letter stated that the writer was enjoying about the best health of his life and weighed more than he ever had. He is anxious to return to the city and inquired of the weather conditions here. Col. Pearre is keeping in close touch with his affairs in Cumberland. He is also taking plenty of exercise, walking from five to ten miles daily. It is expected that he will return to Cumberland about the middle of April.—Cumberland News.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mrs. Alexander Smith, of Chicago, Ill., who was called to Garrett county on account of the death and burial of her sister, Mrs. Edward Grimm, of Dodson, spent a few days of this week a guest of her brother and family, Mr. Lewis Baldwin.

Mr. Aden Duckworth, of Firm Rock, who has been sick with an incurable disease for the past three or four months, is reported in a critical condition with slight hope of his lasting over this week. His son, Mr. Floyd Duckworth, a member of the grand jury, was excused from jury duty on Wednesday on account of the serious condition of his father.

Monday was a day of umbrellas and gum shoes and "took the cake" for rain and mud. All trains East and West on the grade of the B. & O. were more or less behind time with slow-up orders and special instructions to look out for rocks and slides.

Mr. John Miller is a member of the grand jury. Having a number of business interests at stake that require daily personal supervision, it is safe to say John enjoys the distinction hugely.

Mr. John Spence, of Wallman, brother of Mr. James Spence, was in town Sunday visiting relatives.

Misses May and Edith Warnick, of Elk Garden, are the guests this week of Miss Edith Eliott.

About twenty men are employed on the approach to the new bridge on the West Virginia side of the river. It is expected the bridge will be open for traffic by Saturday.

The public exhibition given on the streets last Tuesday afternoon by two of our young men did not in any way add to the credit and reputation of the participants. It would have been better for both of them had the wallowing been "cut out" entirely.

Notwithstanding the threatening condition of the weather on last Sunday the opening of the new M. E. church was a decided success in every particular. Large and attentive congregations attended the services during the day and evening and quite a nice sum of money was realized from the collections, which will aid very materially in reducing the debt. The musical part of the program was exceptionally fine. The choir was unusually large for this place and showed the result of careful and experienced training. Miss Shook, of Bond, deserves special mention for her singing at the morning and evening services. Rev. H. H. Kight held the first service in the morning, Dr. Davis of Piedmont, in the afternoon and Rev. Heavener, of the Midland M. E. church, at night.

Mr. George Oss, one of the members of the firm of Oss Bros., operating a lumber mill on the Savage river, near this place, was in town Sunday.

Mr. Samuel Fleming, a miner in the employ of the N. Y. mine at Blaine, while visiting in Bloomington, and walking on the B. & O. between this place and Savage on last Friday evening about 10 o'clock, was struck by an eastbound helper and thrown from the track. He sustained a bad facture of the left leg and cuts and bruises about the head. The injured man was picked up by Engineer "Jack" Helferstay and taken to Piedmont on his engine where he remained until next morning when he was moved to the Hoffman hospital at Keyser.

Messrs. Joseph Tibbets and John Nutter, of Savage had legal business on hand at Oakland on Wednesday.

Supt. O. Tibbets, of Savage, was in town on business Wednesday.

Mule power has been installed in the Buxton mines until such time as the new machinery can be added to the rope haulage.

Dr. and Mrs. James Reynolds are rejoiced over the birth of a son. He was born last Friday evening.

Mr. W. A. Brydon's condition shows no improvement. He is still confined to his room.

GRANTSVILLE.

John Zehner had public sale on the 15th inst. Cows brought good prices.

Valentine Bender rented his farm to Jonas Ash. Val is going to run the woolen mill to its full capacity.

No prospects for much sugar this season. Some opened their camps and got a short run and now it is to warm.

The saw mills that had closed down this winter in this section on account of the deep snow, are again in operation.

The roads are almost impassable.

The following parties from this place attended the Hagerstown blooded stock sale on the 7th inst.: Jacob S. Miller, Simon M. Yoder, C. W. Bender, H. S. Yoder, and Lewis S. Yoder. C. W. Bender brought two thoroughbred Shropshire ewes and Simon W. Yoder got one ewe and Jacob S. Miller captured the prize winning Shropshire ram. The sheep were bought to lay the foundation for a fine flock of Shropshires. H. S. Yoder was on the lookout for a few fine Shorthorn Durham cows, but as he could not suit himself at the sale he went to see a breeder of fine Shorthorns and succeeded in buying the eight year old prize winning cows, "Lady Rose" that took three first prizes at the Hagerstown Fair at three different times and her two year old grand daughter equally as fine an animal as her grand mother that weighs sixteen hundred pounds in show condition. After he had them at home he was so well pleased with his selection that he took a trip some where in Pennsylvania in pursuit of a male suitable as a first class herd header. He succeeded in buying a dark red animal that weighs 2400 pounds. This is an animal that will make any breeder smile. Both cow and heifer are deep red. This is to be the foundation of his future herd of Shorthorns. I predict in the near future the northern end of Garrett County can show as fine Shorthorn cattle and Shropshire sheep as any in the state of Maryland. H. C. Yoder sold one bull calf nine months old for $58 and also sold eight cows to make room for the new stook he purchased.

Rev. D. H. Friend has been visiting his daughters at Friendsville.

S. G. Savage and Rufus Enlow have gone to Oakland to attend court as jurors.

George W. Moon spent last week in different parts of West Virginia. He reports the season much farther advanced out there.

We have been having a regular siege of sickness here lately. There are several cases of pneumonia. Among whom Mr. Elijah Hoye, we are glad to note is convalescing.

Miss Margaret Browning who had just recently recovered from typhoid now has pneumonia. Her brother William also has the same fever.

We also regret to announce that Roy Friend and we understand his father, S. M. Friend, 'also have the same fever.

We hope to be able to report all well and happy in the near future.

Let us have no foolishness over the telephones when people are trying to get important messages through.

BECKMAN.

We have been having some very fine weather lately.

Mr. Renza Calhoun and sister Miss Gertie, of Mt. Lake Park, have been the guests of Mr. and Mrs. John A. Wilt the past week.

Miss Lilian Calhoun is getting along very nicely with her school at this place.

The farmers of this place will soon commence their spring plowing.

Miss Gertie Calhoun and Mr. Renza Calhoun and Mr. Martin Childs were were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Dick Custer Sunday.

Our school will close at this place April 7th.

Mr. O'Brien, who has been sick, is improving.

DIED.

THOMAS—At his home near Sand Spring, Garrett county, on Wednesday, the 22nd inst., Burbridge Thomas, aged 39 years, five months and 22 days. His remains were intered in the cemetery near his home the 25th inst., Rev. Donachy officiating who delivered a very impressive sermon from 1st Cor. 15, 20. The choir sang several very appropriate hymns among them being one entitled "Death Shall Not Destroy My Comforter." This selection, by the request of the deceased, had been sung to him by one of his brothers a few days preceding his demise. He was a consistent member of the Church of God for 16 years having been converted under the ministerial work of Rev. R. R. Vananum. Mr. Thomas' remains were followed to the grave by a large concourse of sorrowing relatives, friends and neighbors. He leaves a widow and three children, one son and two daughters, who have the deep felt sympathy of their neighbors and friends. The pall bearers were Messrs. Franklin Humberson, Wm. Humberson, David Taylor, John Taylor, Freeman Savage and Samuel Vansickle. He now rests from his labors, feeling assured that he has gone home enjoying the company of a loving father and sister who had preceded him. W. W. S.

LOWDERMILK.—Mrs. Elizabeth Lowdermilk died at the home of her son, J. M. Lowdermilk, near Hoyes, March 10, at the ripe old age of almost 93 years. She lived a consistent Christian life all these years. She had a wonderful memory and retained her mental faculties to the very last. Her children, grandchildren and great grandchildren rise up and call her blessed.

His Condition Caused by Blood Clot Forming on his Brain.

The many warm personal friends of Dr. W. H. Ravenscraft, who for many years has been a practicing physician in Oakland and the County Health Officer, will be pained to hear of that gentleman's extreme illness, he having been stricken very suddenly on last Thursday afternoon by the rupture of a blood vessel in his head, and the consequent formation of a clot on his brain which for two or three days threatened to prove fatal, but at this time the patient is very much improved and if favorable conditions continue it is probable that he will recover his usual good health.

His two sons, Messrs. Walter, of Ridgway, Pa., and Will, of Denver, Col., were communicated with as soon as possible after the father had been taken ill, they arriving here the former Friday morning and the latter Sunday afternoon.

Many inquiries are being made daily from all sections of the country regarding the Doctor's condition and it will be good news to his many friends to learn of his improved condition.

Letter to Browning Bros. Oakland, Md.

Dear Sirs: Porterhouse, so much; neck, so much; all the way between.

Just so with paint. Devoe lead-and-zinc is the porterhouse. Nobody wants the neck; the between, some say, is good enough for them.

But Devoe costs less, not more, than between. Lead-and-oil is between; it is the old-fashion paint. But zinc has come in. Zinc toughens white lead. Devoe lead-and-zinc is the paint that wears twice as long as lead-and-oil.

Mr. John N. Deitel, Fair Haven, N Y, writes.

"Mr. Charles Hollenbeck, of he place, painted his house three years ago with Devoe lead-and-zinc; his father painted at the same time with lead-and-oil. To-day the son's house looks as well as the day it was painted, while the father's house has all chalked off and needs painting very badly. The father says he will paint with Devoe next time."

Yours truly

Notice to Contractors!

Notice of Letting the Contract for a Jail and Sheriff's Residence, for Garrett County, at It's County Seat, Oakland, Md.

Sealed proposals will be received by the Clerk of the County Commissioners of Garrett County, at Oakland, Md., for the furnishing of all materials and labor required for the erection and completion of a Jail and Sheriff's Residence according to the plans and specifications prepared by Holmboe & Lafferty, Architects, Clarksburg, W. Va., copies of which are now on file at the Commissioners' Office and at the office of the above named Architects.

Said proposals will be received until 2 o'clock P. M. on the 12th Day of April, 1905,

and will be opened the same day by the County Commissioners and as soon as the said proposals have been examined the said County Commissioners will take action towards the letting of the contract.

Each proposal must be accompanied by a certified check of twenty-five per cent. of its amount, or a surety bond for a like amount made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett county as a guarantee that the successful bidder will enter into a contract and furnish a bond double the amount of his bid.

This bond must be issued by a regular Surety Guarantee Co., and furnished within a reasonable time after the contract has been signed.

The said check or bond shall become forfeited to the County Commissioners if for any reason the successful bidder shall fail to enter into a contract and furnish the bond as aforesaid after its acceptance by the said County Commissioners.

This bond must be made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett County and the conditions of the said bond shall guarantee the faithful performance and execution of the work according to the plans and specifications on file as aforesaid.

After the contract has been signed and the bond approved the certified checks will be returned to their respective makers and if the contract is not awarded within two weeks from the opening of the bids the obligation of the bidders will cease and their checks returned.

Each bidder shall accompany his bid with samples of the material he intends to use for cell construction, with a full size sample of the grating 2 inches square, and samples of plates 4 inches square, also a model or full size drawing of the locking device with detail specifications covering its construction; also each bidder must accompany his bid with samples of the cut stone.

The County Commissioners will award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder and they reserve the right to reject one or all bids.

By order of the Board,
1-5t. A. G. ROSS, Clerk.

TO VOTE ON AMENDMENT.

Gourt of Appeals of the State so Decided Thursday.

At Annapolis with all eight judges concurring in all the principal features of the decision and three dissenting in many of the essential facts of the proceedings, an opinion was handed down Thursday by the Court of Appeals in the mandamus proceedings against Governor Warfield to compel him to proclaim the elective franchise amendment.

The opinion, twenty-five typewritten pages, affirms the decision of the lower court and instructs Governor Warfield to proclaim the amendment. It denies that he had the right to either veto the bill or cause its passage by failing to return it to the Legislature within six days of its presentment.

Three judges discussed as to the wording in which the matter should be placed before the voters, they placing a construction on the wording which would appear, that there had been some effort made to have the bill inoperative at any stage.

The court cities at great length opinions on proceedings instituted on lines similar to the present contention, which were handed down in Pennsylvania and Louisiana makes use of the language of article 14 of the Maryland constitution, which stated that proposal of an amendment by the General Assembly in the form of a bill shall have its passage by three fourths of all the members elected to each house, the entry of the proposed amendment on the journal, the publication by order of the Governor for at least three months before the next general election, a vote of the people, and if a majority of the voters are favorable to its adoption, a proclamation by the Governor declaring the amendment to be adopted and henceforth the amendment shall be part of the constitution,

The court holds that there is not a word or syllable to be found in any of the provisions even suggesting that the Governor is entitled to participate in any way in formulating and proposing amendments to the constitution.

Coming to the second section of the bill the opinion uses the following language:

"The second section of the franchise amendment bill is in these words: And be it further enacted that the foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the constitution of the state shall be, at the next general election for members of the General Assembly to be held in this state, submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof for their adoption or rejection in pursuance of the directions contained in Article XIV of the constitution, and at said election the vote on said proposed amendment shall be by ballot and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words for the constitutional amendment or against the constitutional amendment, as the voters shall elect, and immediately after said election due return shall be made to the Governor of the vote on the said proposed amendment as directed by said article of the constitution."

"Now it cannot be pretended," continues the court, "that the clause directing the amendment to be submitted to the legal and qualified voters of the state at the next general election for the General Assembly is distinctively and essentially a legislative provision, requiring the Governor's approval, because it is precisely what article 14 prescribes shall be done, and if the clause had been entirely omitted from the section the constitutional mandate would have been operative, as it still is effective in this particular. Nor is the requirement that the vote on the proposed amendment shall be by ballot a legislative enactment, because the constitution itself, in section 1, article 1 declares that all elections shall be by ballot.

The proposed amendment to the constitution of the state, which has for its purpose the disfranchising of a large portion of the illiterate negro vote, was offered by Mr. Wilson at the last session of Legislature.

The amendment was adopted in caucus by the Democratic members, but subsequently it was learned that it did not meet with the approval of the Governor, who wanted among others, a property qualification. The Governor also objected to other features and had prepared a message vetoing the measure.

When his intentions became known the Democratic leaders, after passing the amendment on both sides, consulted Mr. Bernard Carter and other leaders at the bar and these decided that an amendment to the constitution did not require executive approval.

It was, therefore, never submitted to the Governor. After adjournment of the Legislature it was agreed that a friendly suit be instituted with the view of determining by mandamus proceedings whether the Governor's approval is necessary.

Gen. Murray Vandiver asked for a mandamus compelling the Governor to promulgate the amendment, and the fight was on. Attorney General Bryan backed the Governor in his contention and argued the case for the state.

On December 22 last Judge Revell, in the Circuit Court, at Annapolis, decided that the constitutional amendment must be submitted to a vote of the people by Governor Warfield.

The court overruled the demurrer filed by Attorney General Bryan for the Governor and decided to grant the writ of mandamus asked for by Murray Vandiver, state treasurer, who filed the bill as a private cititzen.

The Governor at once appealed, and the Court of Appeals took up the matter for final adjudication.

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

"An act to amend section 1 of article 1 of the constitution of this state and to provide for the submission of said admendment to the qualified voters of this state for adoption or rejection."

Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, three-fifths of all the members of each of the two houses concurring, that the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to section 1 of article 1 of the constitution of this state, and it adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof, as herein provided, it shall supersede and stand in place and stead of section 1 of said article 1.

Section 1—All elections by the people shall be by ballot. Every male citizen of the United States, whether native born or naturalized, of the age of 21 years or upward who have resided in this state for one year and in the legislative district of Baltimore city or in the county in which he may offer to vote for six months next preceding the election, and who, moreover, is duly registered as a qualified voter, as provided in this article, shall be entitled to vote in the ward or election district in which he resides at all elections hereafter to be held in this state, and in case any county or city shall be so divided as to form portions of different electoral district for the election of representatives in Congress, senators, delegates or other officers, then to entitle a person to vote for such officer he must have been a resident of that part of the county or city which shall form a part of the electoral district in which he offers to vote for six months next preceding the election, but a person who shall have acquired a residence in such county or city entitling him to vote at any such election shall be entitled to vote in the election district from which he removed until he shall have acquired a residence in the part of the county or city to which he has removed. Every such male citizen of the United States having the above prescribed qualifications of age and residence shall be entitled to be registered so as to become a qualified voter if he be:

First. A person able to read any section of the constitution of this state, submitted to him by the officers of registration and to give a reasonable explanation of same; or if unable from physical disability to read such section, able to understand and give a reasonable explanation thereof when read to him by the registration officers; or

Second. A person who on the first day of January, 1869, or prior thereto was entitled to vote under the laws of this state or of any other state of the United States wherein he then resided; or Third. Any male lineal descendant of such last mentioned person. No person not thus qualified by coming under some one of the above descriptions shall be entitled to be registered as a qualified voter nor be entitled to vote.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the constitution of this state shall be at the next general election of members of the General Assembly to be held in this state submitted to the legal and qualified votors thereof for their adoption or rejection in pursuance of the direction contained in article 14 of the constitution, and at said election the vote on said proposed amendment shall be by ballot, and upon such ballot shall be written or printed the words "For the Constitutional Amendment," or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voters shall elect; and immediately after said election due returns shall be made to the Governor of the vote on said proposed amendment, as directed by the said fourteenth article of the constitution."

Jesus The Good Shepherd

Jesus had lately used those indispensables, "light" and "water," as emblems of His office and function. He now employs a new figure, almost as familiar, for the Hebrews were always a pastoral folk. This, with the story of the Vine and Branches (chapter xv), is said to be the only instance of allegory in the New Testament.

The Jewish Church had grown into a great ecclesiastical establishment, furnishing numerous offices of honor, power, and emolument. These were naturally sought by the ambitious, and held tenaciously by the successful. One object of this allegory is to set forth the character of these mercenaries. Like thieves, they have effected an entrance in such a way that their true character has not been discovered. But, though they have obtained the garb of office, they do not have the following of the true members. The latter, instead of following, flee, and do not hear them. The character of these false shepherds is further delineated. They work havoc in the highest interests of men. They steal, kill, and destroy in the realm of spiritual values. Their surely mercenary spirit is indicated by the epithet, "hireling." In any final crisis, when the very life of those whom they serve is at stake, they would fly like arrant cowards. Thus, with steady and corageous hand, Jesus held the mirror before the hierarchy of His day.

On the dark background of the false shepherd Jesus now projects the ideal of the true. He is one who enters upon His function in the appointed way. The Holy Spirit (the porter) approves; the Church recognizes Him (the sheep hear His voice). His life is spent in care of the flock; He calleth, leadeth, putteth forth, goeth before.

Jesus makes a decided turn in the allegory when He declares Himself to be "the Door." Entrance to the Church is by the Person and work of Jesus. As the Eastern sheepfold has but one door, so the Church has none other than Christ. "There is none other name under heaven given among men." Through Him we come to salvation and spiritual sustenance (find pasture) and the more abundant life.

Again, there are shepherds and shepherds, but Jesus is pre-eminently the Shepherd. The evidence of this is His voluntary surrender of life and the reciprocal and perfect recognition subsisting between shepherd and sheep—analogous to that which maintains between Father and Son.

Finally Jesus bursts the shell of Jewish sectarianism in the generous and courageous words, "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold." It was a hint of this kind which had led these sectarists, on a former occasion, to ask scornfully, "Will He go and teach the Gentiles?" Alas! how they did "dissolve the pearl of charity in the acid of sect." The "one Shepherd" exalts persons above institutions, when He says there shall be "one flock," not "one fold," as in the Authorized Version, which gives precisely the opposite sense. The reference is to the invisible Church, made up of the faithful of every age and land.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The division of chapters is arbitrary, and, in this instance, unfortunate. One must look in the closing verses of the preceeding chapter to find the circumstances which led to the speaking of this allegory. Jesus had said that he had come for judgment; that those who saw not might see, and that those who saw might be made blind. The official pride of the leaders was touched by that saying. To parry his blow, they cried, "As if such a thing was impossible and even unthinkable. Jesus practically said, in response, "I will now hold up the mirror and show you what kind of shepherds you are." His merciful purpose was to awaken some of the best to self-knowledge and healing.

* * * * *

Every one who enters by this door (Christ) is saved and becomes in turn a minister of grace to others (a shepherd, not the Shepherd, as in Authorized Version). The pattern is Jesus. Every good shepherd lives for the flock.

* * * * *

He who, shunning the door, climbs up from some other quarter, by that very act reveals his dishonest character and unworthy purpose.

* * * * *

"To steal" and "to have life." The contrast is that of the false and true religion. Phariseeism and ecclesiasticism fleece and kill They have always done so everywhere and by whatever name they have been known. But true religion always gives the present life a more abundant development. "Whatever form of religion tends to deprive mankind of its free, natural, and joyous life is anti-Christian. The constant tendency of Christ's teaching and influence is to make the whole life—social intellectual, moral, and spiritual—more abundant."

* * * * *

"Lay down life, take it again." The mother lays down her life in the birth and rearing of every child. She takes life again in the matured manhood or womanhood of her offspring. The analogy maintains in the suffer and sacrifice of Jesus. He voluntarily surrendered His life. No one took it. Now, with joy, He "sees His seed," His spiritual offspring, and prolongs His days in them, as the prophet said He would. (Isa. liii.)

* * * * *

"They understood not." How their worship of the letter had destroyed all commerce between their minds and the relations which it set forth! "The sheep did not hear them." It is the preachers of Christ who alone have secured the world's attention. "And shall be safe." The extent and assurance of this safety are expressed in the parable, "Go in and out." An Hebraistic phrase to denote the whole of life. "The hireling" not every one who is hired is a hireling, but he who serves only for hire. "He goeth before them:" Jesus tests in His own Person the experiences of His disciples. "The other sheep also shall hear Jesus' voice." They have already heard fragments of his teaching through their noblest fellows, but they shall now have His doctrine entire.

Mosaic from Commentaries.

I am: The central point of the whole is the Lord's testimony to Himself as the Good Shepherd in the highest sense or the word. First, however, he speaks preparitorily (1 6) concerning human shepherds generally, anticipating and preparing the way for what follows.—Stier. A hireling: Who makes merchandise.—Clark. The shepherd in the East is usually the owner or the son of the owner of the flock, though sometines an agent, whose salary is a fixed proportion of the produce, as Jacob under Laban. The hireling is the man who happens to be hired for fixed wages, merely for the day, and has no further interest in the flock.—Tristram. The sheep are not: Who has no property in them. By this He points to His own peculiar relations to the sheep.—J. F. B. The wolf coming: Not the devil distinctively, but generally whoever comes upon the flock with hostile intent.—J. F. B. The wolf is the enemy of souls in any of his manifold disguises, as not only persecution, but heresy, worldly living, or a low standard of faith and morals.—Sadler. Am known of Mine: The soul's response to the voice that has inwardly called it.—J. F. B. Other sheep: He means the perishing Gentiles.—Ibid. Came before Me: Came instead of Me.—Clark. Do not imagine I shall lay down My life for the Jews exclusively. I shall die also for Gentiles.—Ibid.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there has come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hog and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

Gen. Gordon's Night Sortie

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

March 25, 1865

[Copyright, 1905, by G. L. Kilmer.]

GENERAL JOHN B. GORDON'S description of the famous Confederate attack which he led against Grant's lines at Petersburg, March 25, 1865, I heard from his own lips in 1878, and about that time another auditor, Henry W. Grady, put it in print in the Philadelphia Times. Having been a participant on the Federal side in repelling the assault, the narration was one of thrilling interest to me. In the following extracts from the Times article are given the chief points of the brilliant forlorn attempt to raise the siege of Petersburg and unite the armies of Johnston and Lee:

You remember the situation of affairs in Virginia about the 1st of March, 1865. Grant had massed an enormous army in front of Petersburg and Richmond, and fresh troops were hurrying to his aid. Our army covered a line of over twenty miles and was in great distress.

My corps (Stonewall Jackson's old corps) had been placed upon the right wing of the army. I had general instructions to protect the flank of the army, prevent General Grant from turning it, and, above all, to protect the slender line of road from which solely we received our scanty supplies. We were almost continually engaged in fighting, making feints, protecting our skirmish lines, which the enemy were feeling and pressing continually. Before daylight on the morning of the 2d of March, 1865, General Lee sent for me. I mounted my horse at once and rode to the general's headquarters. I reached the house in which he was staying at about 4 o'clock in the morning.

As I entered the room to which I had been directed I found General Lee alone. I shall never forget the scene. The general was standing at the fireplace, his head on his arm, leaning on the mantelpiece, the first time I ever saw him looking so thoroughly dejected. A dim lamp was burning on a small center table. On the table was a mass of official reports. General Lee remained motionless for a moment after I opened the door. He then looked up, greeted me with his usual courtesy, motioned me to the little table and, drawing up a chair, sat down. I sat opposite him.

"I have sent for you, General Gordon," he said, "to make known to you the condition of our affairs and to confer with you as to what we had best do." The night was fearfully cold. The fire and lamp both burned low as General Lee went on to give me the details of the situation. "I have here," he said, "reports sent in by my officers tonight. I find upon careful examination that I have under my command of all arms hardly 45,000 men. These men are starving. Their sufferings are terrible and exhausting. My horses are broken down and impotent. I am apprehensive that Grant may press around my flank and cut our sole remaining line of supplies. Now, general," he said, looking me straight in the face, "what is to be done?"

With this he laid his paper down and leaned back in his chair. I replied:

"Since you have done me the honor to ask my opinion, I will give it. The situation as you protray it is infinitely worse than I had dreamed it was. I cannot doubt that your information is correct. I am confident that one of two things should be done at once. We must either treat with the United States government on the best terms possible or we should concentrate all our strength on one point of Grant's line—selecting some point on the right bank of the Appomattox—assault him, break through his lines, destroy his pontoons, then turn full upon the flank of his left wing, sweep down it and destroy it if possible, and then join General Johnston in North Carolina by forced marches and, combining our army with his, fall upon Sherman."

"And what then?"

"If we beat him and succeed in making considerable battle, treat at once for terms. I am forced to the conclusion, from what you say, sir, that we have no time for delay."

I finally submitted the plan of battle to General Lee, which he approved and ordered executed. It was briefly this: "To take Fort Stedman by direct assault at night; then send a separate body of men to each of the rear forts, who, claiming to be Federals, might pass through the Federal reserves and take possession of the rear line of forts, as if ordered to do so by the Federal commander; next, then to press with my whole force to the rear of Grant's main line and force him out of his trenches, destroy his pontoons, cut his telegraph wires and press down his flank." We both recognized it as the forlornest of forlorn hopes.

Fort Stedman was made the point of attack because it was the nearest to the Confederate works, being about sixty rods from Colquitt's salient. There were two strong Federal works on the right and left of Fort Stedman—namely, Fort Haskell and Fort McGillvery—distant respectively 80 and 100 yards. There was also an intrenched line of infantry and batteries connecting these works and a second intrenched line a hundred yards in the rear. A mile in rear of this position Grant had a military railroad and telegraph extending the whole length of his intrenched camps. Gordon's success would depend upon his cutting the telegraph and railroad to delay the bringing of Federal re-enforcements on the scene.

General Gordon's story continues:

General Lee sent me, in addition to my own corps, a portion of Longstreet's corps (Pickett's division), a portion of A. P. Hill's and a body of cavalry. During the whole night of the 24th of March I was on horseback making preparations for disposing of troops. About 4 o'clock in the morning I called close around me fifty axmen and four companies, 100 each, of brave men who were selected to do this hazardous work. I spoke to them of the character of the undertaking and of the last hope of the cause which was about to be confided to them. Around the shoulders of each man was bound a white strip of muslin, which Mrs. Gordon, who sat in a room not far distant listening for the signal gun, had prepared as a means of recognition of each other. The hour had come, and when everything was ready I stood on the breastworks of Colquitt's salient and ordered two men to my side with rifles, who were to fire the signal for attack. The noise of moving our own obstructions was going on and attracted the notice of a Federal picket. In the darkness his voice rang out:

"Hello, there, Johnny Reb! What are you making all that fuss about over there?"

The men were just leaning forward for the start. The sudden call disconcerted me somewhat, but the rifleman on my right came to my assistance by calling out in a cheerful voice:

"Oh, never mind us, Yank. Lie down and go to sleep. We are just gathering a little corn. You know, rations are mighty short over here."

There was a patch of corn between our lines, some of it still hanging on the stalks. After a few moments there came back the kindly reply of the Yankee picket, which quite reassured me. He said:

"All right, Johnny. Go ahead and get your corn. I won't shoot at you."

"Bang! Bang!" Two shots broke the stillness, and I commanded, "Forward!" The chosen 100 sprang forward eagerly, followed by the axmen, and for the last time the stars and bars were carried to aggressive assault. In a moment the axmen were upon the abatis of the enemy and hewing it down. I shall never know how they whisked this line of wire fastened obstruction out of the way. The 100 overpowered the pickets, sent them to the rear, rushed through the gap made by the axmen up the slope of Fort Stedman, and it was ours without the firing of a single gun and with the loss of but one man. He was killed with the bayonet.

The three companies who were to attempt to pass the reserves and go into the rear forts followed and passed through Fort Stedman. Then came other troops pouring into the fort. We captured, I think, 9 pieces of artillery, 11 mortars and about 600 or 700 prisoners, among whom was General McLaughlin, who was commanding on that portion of the Federal line. Many were taken in their beds.

I now anxiously awaited to learn the fate of the 300 who had been sent in companies of 100 each to attempt the capture of the three rear forts. Soon a messenger reached me from two officers commanding two of these chosen bodies, who informed me that they had succeeded in passing right through the line of Federal reserves by presenting themselves as Federals and had certainly gone far enough to the rear for the forts, but that their guides had abandoned them or been lost and that they did not know in what direction to move. It was afterward discovered when daylight came that these men had gone farther out than the forts and could easily have entered and captured them if the guides had not been lost or had done their duty. Of course after dawn they were nearly all captured, being entirely behind the Federal reserves.

In the meantime the few Federal soldiers who had escaped from the fort and intrenchments we had captured had spread the alarm and aroused the Federal army. The hills in the rear of Grant's lines were soon black with troops. By the time it was fairly daybreak the two forts on the main line flanking Fort Stedman (Fort Haskell and Fort McGillvery), the three forts in the rear and the reserves all opened up upon my forces. We held Fort Stedman and the Federal intrenchments to the (Appomattox) river, or nearly so, but the guides had been lost, and in consequence the rear forts had not been captured. Failing to secure these forts, the cavalry could not pass out, the pontoons could not be destroyed and the telegraph wires were not cut.

In addition to these mishaps, the trains had been delayed, and Pickett's division and other troops sent me by General Lee had not arrived. The success had been brilliant so far as it had gone and had been achieved without loss of any consequence to our army, but it had failed in the essentials to a complete success or to a great victory. Every hour was bringing heavy re-enforcements to the Federals and rendering my position less and less tenable. After a brief correspondence with General Lee it was decided to withdraw. My loss, whatever it was, occurred in withdrawing under concentrated fire from forts and infantry.

Among the Confederate officers lost was Major Grady of Gordon's staff (father of the late Henry W. Grady, the noted Georgia journalist). Major Grady was shot dead in saddle about fifty yards from the parapets of Fort Haskell while leading a charge to silence the guns of that work as a cover to Gordon's retreat. This charge was made in full daylight, and Major Grady in person came under my own eye.

One feature of the battle General Gordon nobly passed over in silence. It was not for him to tell it, although there is a hint of it in the words which he quotes from Lee about the lack of rations in the Confederate army. His soldiers were actually famished, and when they found themselves within our camp, surrounded by an abundance of bread and meat, they fell to and ate a square meal. The time thus lost was fatal. Our cannoneers stood to the guns, our infantry lined the parapets on the flanks and in front of the assailants, and the golden hour for Gordon and Lee was added to the eternity of bygones.

Apple Blossoms And November

By
VIRGINIA LEILA WENTZ

Copyright, 1905, by Virginia Leila Wentz.

"I am not hard hearted, you know, but I must pay my bills when they fall due." The stout landlady compressed her lips, as though she had said a thing which it hurt her to utter.

"I understand, indeed," the girl replied passively, pushing back her heavy, gleaming hair with a little gesture of weariness.

"Of course, tomorrow bein' Thanksgivin' day, you needn't disturb yourself, but make yourself comfortable till Friday." She looked at the blank door, which closed quietly behind the girl; then her eyes returned to the columns of her account book. They were opened at a page headed "Miss Rose Darcey," a page where the debits considerably overbalanced the credits.

"I've too good a heart to be a successful business woman," murmured the landlady, closing the book.

Twilight was fast coming on. Upstairs in the fourth floor back there was a fire in the grate—bright yellow and scarlet flames, burning in a ceaseless endeavor to destroy an asbestus log. Rose Darcey slipped down on the floor and, with her arms folded about her knees, watched the fire, thinking how typical it was of the life she had been leading for the past year. Why, everything—even her hearth fire—was artificial!

She fell to dreaming. It was seldom she had time to dream, for she was always busy trying to make both ends meet. But now, since they simply would not meet, she might as well dream for a tiny space. How tired she was of it all—of the struggles, the petty ambitions, the give and take friendships, the endless cold shoulders, the eternal worry!

And tomorrow would be Thanksgiving day! How well she remembered that day in other years! In her aunt's humble little farmhouse there had ever been the entrancing odor of pumpkin and mince pies, of stewed cranberries, of browning turkey, of plum pudding, of good things innumerable. Not this year, though, for she had robbed them of all that. Oh, it was hard, hard, hard!

"JOHN, IT'S JUST LIKE IT WAS IN THE DREAM."

A rap at the door, and Patty Lou, the colored girl, entered.

"A gem'man in the parlor to see you, missy; wouldn't send his name, allowin' he wanted to s'prise you, I reckon."

Down in the narrow, gaudy room a man with a gray mustache and a shaggy coat sat on the sofa alone. As he looked unseeingly about him the stern lines in his mouth relaxed. In their stead came an expression of extreme gentleness.

All his years of waiting harked back to him. He seemed to see as in a glass a tiny girl in a gingham apron standing under an apple tree, and then she seemed to grow and grow, but always she had sunshine in her hair and a smile in her eyes. He had waited for her to attain to womanhood, dreaming dreams the villagers had never guessed. And then, because she had talent for art, forsooth, and her aunts had said it must be cultivated, even though it meant a third mortgage on their little farm, she had passed out of his life.

Lately, however, John Lowell had caught a rumor that things were not going well with her in the mad, competitive life of New York, and so he was here.

How thin and white she had grown! As she pushed aside the cheap Bagdad portieres she seemed to be all gleaming hair and great, pathetic eyes. If he could only hold her proud little face between both palms and kiss her dear, tired eyes!

Instead (he knew her temperament so well) he talked about the home village, about the queer poky little streets and the dull village gossip.

"Is the apple crop good this year?" she asked suddenly. "Have you ground a lot of cider?"

For answer he dived into one of the pockets of his shaggy gray coat and fetched up a shining red apple.

"Thanks. It's a beauty!" exclaimed she, feeling of its smoothness.

"Came off your tree, Rose."

"My tree?"

"Yes; the immense one in the corner. Don't you remember? I've called it your tree ever since—since one day when you were very little and you wanted some blossoms."

"I suppose you got them for me if I wanted them?" said the girl softly. How good he had always been to her! He was just like that shaggy coat of his—big and rough and wholesome and worth while.

Last night she had dreamed that her head lay on that same shaggy coat, that his strong arms were about her, while she was relating to him all the discouragements of her metropolitan experience, and each time that she had lifted her head to emphasize some point or other—how good it had been to get back to the coat afterward—in the dream, of course!

"You see, the blossoms were out of your reach," he went on, "and I happened to be coming along, so you said if I'd get you the flowers you'd be my"—

"What?"

"Sweetheart." The word was very tenderly uttered. The tenderness made her tremble somehow, but she laughed gayly.

"Your sweetheart? Rash promise, wasn't it?"

"And when I lifted you up," he continued, "you put your arm about my neck"—

"How shockingly improper!"

"And from that moment," he pursued gravely, "I've never thought of anybody else for—for a wife, Rose."

"How long ago was that?" she asked whimsically.

"Twelve last blossom time."

"Then I must have been only nine years old."

"I wonder, dear, if it would be right to hold a girl to a promise she made when she was only nine?"

From beneath her long lashes she caught the wrapt expression on his face as he leaned toward her, and she quivered with a sense of sudden protection.

"I—wonder?" Her voice trailed off vaguely as she watched a lighted cable car go by, but he caught her to him gladly, with a new air of protection.

A few moments later from the great, shaggy coat came a tearfully muffled but happy cry:

"Oh, John, it's just like it was in the dream—just like it was in the dream!"

To John Lowell the words in themselves were a bit irrelevant, but what did a man like him care for words when he held in his arms the thing he prized most in the world?

Ohio In Japan.

"Cincinnati is in Ohio, and Ohio is also a Japanese word meaning 'good morning,'" said a native of Tokyo. "When you go out on the street in a Japanese village the people you meet will all say to you 'Ohio.' They do not wait for an introduction. It is considered courteous to greet strangers thus.

"An American whose home was in Kentucky, but who did business in Cincinnati, was traveling in Japan and was considerably perplexed that every one who met him on the street should accost him with the word 'Ohio.' He was of an old Kentucky family and, like most Kentuckians, was proud of the state of his nativity. The second day in Japan, when he was met with the same greeting, he turned to his interpreter and said:

"'What in the name of all that is mysterious makes these Japanese think that I came from Ohio? Even if I did come from that state I would not want to have it thrown up to me continually.'

"Before the guide had a chance to reply a young man passed and again saluted the American with an 'Ohio.'

"The Kentuckian turned on the Japanese young man and said:

"'See here, sir, you have made a slight mistake. I am not from Ohio. I live across the river. I am a Kentuckian, and my home is in Covington.'"—Louisville Herald.

Ostrich Battles.

Male ostriches battle for supremacy and admiration of the females with as much ferocity as stags, bulls, buffaloes and other animals. An ostrich battle is amusing, as it amounts practically to a boxing match with the feet, in which the males dance around each other lightly. There is this difference, however: If any boxer could hit as hard as an ostrich with one of his feet he might settle the championship with a single blow. It must not be supposed that the ostrich will not strike his antagonist with his terrible beak. In sparring the ostrich stands on one foot, with the other foot and wings raised, bill wide open and neck distended. He strikes with the force of a trip hammer, and in fighting both birds warily dodge blows. Under modern training an ostrich equals a horse in power and can do many of the stunts of the horse. By aid of his wings an ostrich can leave behind the swiftest running thoroughbred and under harness has paced in about a horse's record time.

What the Pie Was Made Of.

A cooking expert gave a dinner recently to a cooking class of young married women.

"I am making," she said, "a collection of cooking stories. Only yesterday a new one was told me by a dispirited young wife.

"This young wife, who had never cooked so much as a beefsteak in her life, all of a sudden bought a cookbook, entered her kitchen and plunged into the construction of an elaborate and difficult veal pie.

"The pie, a strange looking object, was served to the husband, a caustic person, that night at dinner. He helped himself, tried a mouthful and then said:

"'What's this?'

"'A meat pie,' said the wife. 'I made it out of the cookbook.'

"'Ah,' said the man, 'this leathery part is the binding, I suppose.'"

DEER PARK JOTTINGS.

The Ladies' Home Mission of the Baptist church met Tuesday evening and was attended by all the members of all the churches of this place. A feeling of fraternity exists and sectarianism is a thing of the past, which is commendable among all true Christians and we hope may be emulated in other localities.

Miss Lillie Mae Hutson, of Sunnyside, this county, daughter of our friend, Prof. Benj. F. Hutson, visited Miss E. J. Hove last week. Miss Hutson's many friends of near this place were sorry the did not make her visit longer especially friends at Armistead where she was the efficient teacher a few years ago, and with her genial way and sunny disposition won the hearts of all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance, but how could it be otherwise hailing as she does from the beautiful land of Sunnyside.

Miss June Dunnington, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. Creed Dunnington, late of Parkersburg, W. Va., now or your city, spent a week here with her many friends and relatives and was a general favorite among her young lady friends and was by no means ignored by quite a number of the opposite sex. So we say to this charming young miss, come when your namesake brings forth flowers as rosy as the bloom on your fair cheeks.

Prof. Charles W. Hennen, principal of the Hartmonsville (W. Va.) school, paid a hasty visit to his parents, Engineer and Mrs. Wm. W. Hennen, last Saturday. We are at all times glad to meet and greet this cultured young gentleman.

Mrs. L. D. Thrasher and niece Miss Nelly Hove, after spending the past month in the Nation's capitol visiting relatives and friends both there and at Alexandria, Virginia, and many suburban homes around both cities, returned last week, much to their and their many relatives' and friends' regret, but a joyful greeting awaited them at dear old Deer Park by those most dear by ties of nature.

Mr. Charles A. Jones, a student at the University of Ohio, is expected home on Friday of this week owing to ill health. We are sorry to hear this but have feared that this studious young man with his ambition would overtax his mental faculties, but hope our mountain air with its recuperating ozone will soon prove beneficial, and with quiet and rest at the parental home, we feel sure he will soon recuperate. This is the earnest wish of the friend who pens this and wishes for this young friend all the joys of this life.

A social will be given to their many young friends of this place by Miss Prudence Rodeheaver and her brother Clark at their hospitable home near town on Tuesday of next week, and we know a cordial welcome will be extended by the host and hostess, Rev. and Mrs. J. C. Rodeheaver. We bespeak for our young invited guests a social that will eclipse the many they have been the recipient of in town, for all know country hospitably is the most enjoyable.

Miss Florence, daughter of Postmaster Thrasher, will visit Swanton Friday and expects to remain some days visiting her uncles and aunts near that place, Messrs. Edward and Resley Shank, and other friends in that vicinity. This popular young assistant postmistress will be missed by her many friends but her close attention to domestic and official duties demand a little recreation, and we feel assured from Swanton's well known record for generous hospitality, that our yonng friend will enjoy spring chicken and all the luxuries of the season and among a people who know how to dispense them.

Mrs. Emil F. Droege left on Friday of last week for New York where she will visit her son, Attorney Otto J. Droege who recently married one of New York's most accomplished and wealthy daughters, her father being one of the leading millioniare merchants of that great city. This will be the first time Mrs. Droege has met her daughter-in-law. She expects to be absent for a month or six weeks and will visit her daughter Miss Matilda, in Baltimore and her friend Mrs. L. C. Hendrickson, in Washington, on her homeward trip.

Miss Kate Brown after an absence of some ten days visiting her sister, Mrs. Jenkins, at Loch Lynn, returned to her home this afternoon, much to the joy of quite a bevy of the young ladies of our town. Miss Kate is a general favorite and deservedly so, for she possess that genial nature peculiar to all the gifted daughters from the Southland.

Mr. and Mrs. S. Smith Browning left on Monday for Dodson on the W. Va. C. & P. R. R., where the will remain for some time visiting the benefit home of Mr. Browning's father-in-law, Mr. Martin V. Grimm, who but a few days ago lost a devoted wife, of which mention will be made in these jottings.

Rev. Percy W. Metheny is conducting a series of revival meetings at his church at Mt. Lake Park this week. We wish this devout young minister abundant success in his labours in his Master's vineyard.

We again are called on in a casual way out of respect to an old friend and comrade to mention the sad and unexpected death of Mrs. M. V. Grimm made doubly sad from the fact that just one week before the death of Mrs. Grimm, her eldest son Edward lost his young wife (of which mention was made in your last issue) and now the mother of this bereaved son is called in one short week. She died at her temporary home at Dodson on Thursday last (23d inst.) and was brought to her home at this place on Saturday's accommodation train and after services by her pastor, Rev. E. Manges, she was laid to rest in the Deer Park cemetery in a lot next to her daughter-in-law, who as stated had preceeded her to the spirit world one week before. Mrs. Grimm was the second oldest daughter of the late Samuel W. Friend and his widow, Mrs. Sarah Friend, of our town, also a sister of Mrs. Alex. C. Mason of your city, and has several brothers and sisters in this place and leaves a number of daughters both married and single.

Miss Mamie Steinhart, of Keyser, W. Va., is spending some weeks at her aunt's, Mrs. Hennen, and may remain until this kind family move back to their former home. Miss Steinbart has frequently visited our place, and with her quiet, gentle disposition has drawn around her young life many true and loving friends.

And now, Mr. Editor, of you will not allow the chief of a savage tribe of a certain town in Garrett county, only a small space, and if you protect me as well as yourself, I will close with a sweet trip of some of Deer Park's fair daughters, chaperoned by three of its most cultured matrons. We noticed this morning an elegant span of horses harnessed to a hay wagon all decorated in the latest style (mud) with Mr. John Haines handling the ribbons, and as this prancing team dashed by with its feminine load we inquired what it all meant and found out it was a select party going to Kearney to visit the sugar camp of our old friend Mr. Samuel Stever to enjoy the sweets of maple sugar. This evening we gathered that a most delightful day had been spent and all the wax and maple sugar that eight hungry ladies and driver could devour was consumed to keep them sweet until a certain clerical official from Baltimore pays his weekly visit and contributes his interesting letters to your contemporary paper. But to personate we caught the names of all eight of of this jolly hay ride, sugar fed party, viz: Misses Gertrude S. and Amelia Thrasher, Grace and Lulu Marley, and Miss Nevins, together with Mrs. G. W. Haulenbeek, Mrs. Elmer Haulenbeek and Mrs. Charles Schoolman of Philadelphia, as chaperones, for this sweet, sweeter, sweesest of all spring time mud or hay ride parties.

Pardon so much space; good night.

MORE ANON.

HOYES.

After experiencing the most severe winter we have had for a number of years, we are now enjoying the beautiful spring weather.

Alvin Lowdermilk, who has been attending college at California, Pa., is spending his vacation under the parental roof.

Mrs. Annie Bowman, of Engles Mills, spent Monday of this week with M. Mattingly's family.

Mr. John Winters, of Midlothian, was in our town recently purchasing cattle.

Dorsey Guard, who has been attending musical college at Ada, Ohio, has returned to our neighborhood for the purpose of teaching music. He will begin the term about April 10th. We are much pleased to have him with us again.

Misses Ludie and Sadie Friend are visiting their parents at this place. Miss Sadie will return to Keyser, W. Va., where she will take another term in music.

We are much pleased to state at this writing that Miss Olia Mattingly, who has been quite ill for several weeks past, is much improved. We hope for her recovery soon.

T. C. Bittinger spent last Saturday and Sunday with his parents near Bittinger.

Miss Sadie DeWitt, accompanied by Earl Smith, called on Miss Ruby Casteel at the home of Col. Dewitt Sunday.

Mrs. Maggie Dewitt and daughter Mae are visiting Mrs. W. Meyers, near Buffalo.

Mrs. Jeremiah Enlow and grandson were visitors in our neighborhood one day this week.

FOR RENT

For Summer 1905

At Deer Park, Maryland, Main Line B. & O. R. R., to St. Louis, 2,500 Feet Above Tidewater, a Country Place of About 185 Acres.

"GLAMORGAN."

Thoroughly equipped as a farm and bounded by three county roads, insuring convenience and privacy. It is well adapted to public use such as a Sanatorium or to private residences, five sites with beautiful views and appurtenant acres, being reached by its three miles of private pleasure drives through the woods.

The dwelling house was built from plans by Hewitt Bros., of Philadelphia. The plumbing is by Ogelsby, of the same city. It is in complete order, and is replete with the modern appliances of a gentleman's residence. It is within ten minutes' walk of postoffice and railroad station and within one mile of the Deer Park Hotel. Its general plan is as follows:

Wide porches surround three faces terminated, on a level, with billiard room.

I. FIRST FLOOR. Parlor, hall with main stair case, library, dining room and lavatory.

II. BACK BUILDING. Stair case to cellar, in which are furnace, gas machine (supplied by outside gasometer), wine closet, pantry (hot and cold water), back stairs to second story back building. Laundry—3 stationary tubs, hot and cold water in each; ironing stove, fire hose on reel and special boiler. Kitchen, with range, sink and all appliances. Back porch, ten feet from which is ice house practically inexhaustible in summer; servants bath room, etc.

I. SECOND FLOOR. Two communicating chambers, with bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; total, four chambers with three bath rooms.

II. BACK BUILDING, 2nd FLOOR. Four chambers, two closets, bath room with W. C. adjoining.

THIRD FLOOR. Two chambers, two large lofts.

Every room has gas fixture and eight rooms have open fire-places in addition to furnace register.

The water supply is unexceptionable, its every source being from springs rising within the confines of the place and all having passed analytical examination. Two tanks (each in contact with outside air) having a combined capacity of 14,500 gallons, a wind mill, a horse power and an overshot wheel supplying the motor. Three dams (likewise spring water) contribute the ice supply and two of them are stocked with fish. The outbuildings are a barn with stalls for six horses and eight carriages, with ample storage for hay, straw and oats and having a coachman's room, a tenant's house of five rooms, a large cow and sheep stable and numerous sheds, etc.

This property is without incumbrance and possess on can be given in May, 1905.

Gertrude C. Jeffers, who sues by her husband and next friend, Alpheus M. Jeffers, Alpheus M. Jeffers, Addie Warnick, trustee, Beryl Warnick, Hazel Warnick and Beulah Warnick, infants, who sue by their next friend, George Warnick, and George Warnick, plaintiffs, v. Albert Warnick, Edward E. Warnick, Ida R. Duckworth and Stephen A. Duckworth, her husband, John C. Brydon, Louis B. Brydon and Gilmor S. Hamill, defendants.

No. 1328 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett county, Maryland.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree for the sale of Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, containing fifty acres each, situate, lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, and for a distribution of the proceeds thereof amongst the parties to this cause in proportion to their several interests.

The bill states that the said Gertrude C. Jeffers, Addie Warnick, trustee, for the use and benefit of her three infant children, the said Beryl Warnick, Hazel Warnick and Beulah Warnick, George Warnick, Albert Warnick, Edward E. Warnick and Ida R. Duckworth are each seized and possessed in fee simple of an undivided one seventh interest in and to said Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, and that a certain Truman P. Warnick was likewise seized and possessed of an undivided one-seventh interest in the said lands, the derivation of title to said respective interests being fully set forth in the several exhibits filed with said bill; and that the said Truman P. Warnick, on the 15th day of February, 1902, executed and delivered to the defendant, Gilmor S. Hamill, a mortgage upon his undivided one-seventh interest, and that having defaulted in the payment of the debt secured by said mortgage, on the 18th day of February, 1905, the said Hamill, mortgagee, exercised the power of sale contained in said mortgage and sold the interest of the said Truman P. Warnick in said lands to John C. Brydon and Louis B Brydon to the extent of one-half of said undivided one-seventh interest, and to himself, the said Gilmor S. Hamill, to the extent of one-half of said undivided one-seventh interest, and duly reported said sale to this Court in a cause standing as No. 1315 Equity on the docket of said court as appears by the exhibit filed with said bill relating to said proceedings.

The bill further states that the plaintiffs together with the defendants are seized and possessed it fee simple, as tenants in common of the aforesaid Military Lots Nos. 96 and 97, and that the parties to this suit above named are the only persons interested in said lands; that said real estate is not susceptible of partition without material loss and injury to the parties interested therein, and that in order to make division of said interests and more especially to protect and advance the interests of said infant children, it will be necessary that said real estate be sold and the proceeds thereof divided amongst the parties according to their several interests.

That the said Louis B. Brydon is a non-resident of the State of Maryland; that all the other parties to this cause reside within the State of Maryland, and that all of said parties are adults with the exception of the three infants above named.

The bill then prays for a decree for the sale of said real estate, a distribution among the parties according to their respective interests and for general relief, process and an order of publication.

It is thereupon, the 16th day of March, 1905, by the Circuit Court for Garrett county, in Equity, ordered, that the plaintiff, by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper, published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 15th day of April, 1905, give notice to the said absent defendant of the object and substance of this bill, warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor on or before the 1st day of May next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

TRUSTEES' SALE
OF VALUABLE
Real Estate
On BEAR CREEK, Garrett County, Maryland.

Under and by virtue of a decree of the Circuit Court of Garrett County, sitting in Equity, dated the 22nd day of March, 1905, and passed in a cause standing as No. 1321 Equity on the docket of said court, wherein Frederick Kamp et al. are complainants, and Henrietta Kamp et al. are defendants, the undersigned trustees appointed by said decree hereby give notice that they will on Saturday, the 15th Day of April, 1905,

At the hour of eleven o'clock a. m., of said day, in front of the Postoffice, in the town of Oakland, Maryland, offer at public auction to the highest bidder all those two lots or tracts of land situated, lying and being in Garrett County, Maryland, known and designated as

Military Lots Nos. 2620 and 2624,

Containing fifty acres each, lying on the north prong of Bear Creek near Engles Mill.

These lands are covered with virgin forest consisting of Oak and other hard woods and the timber is valuable.

Also all that other tract of land the same being part of the tract of land called

The Rights of Man, Second Part,

Which is fully described in a deed for the same from William C. Pennington, trustee, to Henry Kamp, dated the 24th day of February, 1880, containing 172 acres, more or less, of which land, however, the said Henry Kamp in his lifetime conveyed to Frederick Kamp the quantity of 122¾ acres, leaving a balance of

49⅝ Acres

To be sold as aforesaid. This land also lies on the north prong of Bear Creek aforesaid and is partly covered with timber. The minerals underlying said land will be offered separately from the timber and surface, and the timber may be offered separately from the surface, which ever in the judgment of the said trustees will be for the best interests of the parties concerned.

TERMS OF SALE—As prescribed by the decree, one-third cash on the day of sale, one-third in six months and one-third in twelve months from the day of sale, the deferred payments to bear interest from the day of sale, and to be secured to the satisfaction of the trustees, or the entire purchase money may be paid in cash, at the option of the purchaser or purchasers.

VOLUME 29. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, APRIL 6, 1905. NUMBER 5

APRIL MEETING OF THE TOWN COUNCIL

Held Monday Evening When Officers for Ensuing Year Were Selected.

SAMUEL LAWTON IS PRESIDENT

Of Council—No Recommendation Made for Night Policeman and the Office Is Therefore Vacant—Routine Business Disposed Of.

Monday evening the regular monthly meeting of the Town Council was held when the recently elected members of that body—Messrs. Dr. John E. Legge, Henry Lauer and D. E. Bolden—were sworn into office, the oath being administer by Mayor McComas, who followed the prescribed form.

The new Council then organized by electing Mr. Samuel Lawton, one of the hold-over members, as its President, and Mr. John C. Dunham, who has been the efficient and painstaking clerk of that body for a number of years, was re-elected to that position.

Mr. N. U. Bond being present made a statement with regard to the installation of a system of water works and sewerage, urging the formation of a local stock company to put in the system, stating that he would subscribe to the stock to a considerable amount. Mr. Bond's proposition was discussed to some extent but nothing tangible being before Council for its conaideration, no definite action could be taken either to accept or reject the offer.

Council then went into executive session and elected the following officers for the ensuing year:

Treasurer, Col A. G. Sturgiss; Tax Collector, Mr. George W. Legge; Weigh Master, Mr. Samuel Ferguson.

The appointments made by Mayor McComas—Attorney, Mr N. S. Heindel; Police Magistrate. Mr. A. B. Fonder, and Bailiff, John J. Sweeney, were confirmed by Council. No appointment was made for night policeman and consequently the office is vacant.

Resuming the open session the monthly bills were passed and ordered paid by the Council.

A letter from E. E. Gaddis, of Washington, an industrial promoter and broker, was presented to the Council, in which the writer desired some information concerning the status of the water question. The letter was referred to a select committee for answer.

The advisibility of erecting the new lock-up and fire department quarters was taken up and it was unanimously agreed to begin the erection of the proposed building as soon as possible.

A committee composed of Mayor McComas and Councilmen Lawton and Harned, was appointed to confer with the electric lighting company relative to the installation of are light to take the place of the incandescent lights now used to illuminate the streets and to report at the next meeting of the Council.

The matter of grading Liberty street from First street west to the corporate limits was discussed and final action will be taken at the adjourned meeting to be held tonight.

Monday, April 17th, was set as appeal day when all persons feeling agrieved at the assessment of their property, will be heard.

Decision Day, April 30, 1905.

The Maryland Sunday School Union invites all Sunday schools in Maryland to observe April 30th as "Decision Day."

It is not intended that the matter of "Decision" be postponed until the day mentioned. It is really a reaping day—a day on which the faithful instructions and personal work of the teachers are manifested. It is hoped, therefore, that the teachers will begin at once, if they have not already begun, to make earnest prayer in behalf of their scholars, and earnest appeals during the lesson hour, and in personal interviews at their homes and elsewhere, to give themselves to Christ. The pastor and superintendent can greatly aid in their public utterances to awaken serious thought on the subject of religion, and the parents have an opportunity, with their wonderful influence, to make "Decision Day" a day of ingathering of the precious children and youth of the Sunday school into the Kingdom of Christ.

Carried $1000 Insurance.

Mr. Jeremiah Casteel, of Kendall, whose death is noted elsewhere in this paper today, carried a life insurance policy in the New York Life, represented at Friendsville by Mr. R. C. McCandlish, for $1000, which amount will be paid his widow within a very short time.

During the past twenty months this company, through its local agent at Friendsville, has paid $3000 insurance to the beneficiaries of the policies written by him. The policies are incontestible from the day they are delivered to the owners and are an asset well worth owning.

MAPLE SUGAR MAKING.

Camp Where the Sweets Are Manufactured Visited By Cumberlander

In last Friday's Cumberland Times a staff correspondent of that paper describes a visit made by him to the sugar camp of Elijah Livengood, of this county, and as many of our readers are unacquainted with the modus operandi of manufacturing sugar from the sap of trees we reproduce the the article, beginning with the correspondent's arrival at Salisbury who arrived there on Wednesday evening previous. Describing the town he says:

This town has a population of over 1200 and is an attractive looking place There are quite a number of large stores, many beautiful dwellings and fine churches and school buildings. The town is laid off and the streets and sidewalks in very fair condition.

This is the central, or rather shipping point for the Somerset-Garrett maple sugar belt. This belt, extending from a line drawn from Meyersdale to Salisbury, as far as Oakland, along the Youghiogheny and Casselman rivers, and Laurel Hill Creek, and their tributaries is one of the largest maple sugar producing sections in the United States. Last year the S. A. Lichliter store of which Mr. Lichliter is manager, shipped 225,000 pounds of maple sugar and 3,000 gallons of syrup. Nearly all of this went to molasses manufacturers. Mr. Lichliter gave me three or four bricks of maple sugar that was a beautiful amber color, the crystals sparkling and the taste delicious.

Sunday morning I started for the home of Mr. Elijah Livengood, who lives about 2 miles south of Salisbury. Mr. Livengood is known as the "king of sugar makers." Last year he made 20,000 pounds of maple sugar and over a thousand gallons of maple syrup.

Arriving at Mr. Livengood's, I was given a cordial welcome and soon was inspecting his sugar grove. Half of his grove is in Pennsylvania and half in Maryland along the Casselman river. He has 3,600 producing trees and everything is arranged to handle the water as quickly as possible. He has two buildings in which he makes the sugar, one on each side of the river. He has large galvanized iron tanks mounted on sleds for hauling the water. At the end of the building there is a slight embankment up which the horses pull the sleds and wagons, on which are the tanks. Here are pipes which convey the water from the tanks into the large receiving tubs inside the building. Pipes then convey the water from this tub to the pans. These pans are 6 feet wide, 14 feet long and over a foot deep. Under the pan is a 6x7 fire box with three doors and soft coal fires are kept going in it. Pipes again convey the syrup into another room to the settling tubs.

In this second room is a small furnace, built under two large iron pots in which the stirring off is done. Then there are tables, troughs, cans and barrels for finishing the work.

It is only by having everything on such a large scale and so convenient that it is possible to make 20,000 pounds of sugar in a year, for it must be remembered that a barrel of water only makes from 4 to 9 pounds of sugar. The record in this camp, at the one building, for boiling water is 185 barrels of water boiled into syrup in 20 hours.

Mr. Livengood has the reputation of making the best sugar in the country. He says the secret of good sugar making is to keep every vessel perfectly clean and allow no rain water to get in the buckets. Last week he had every bucket turned upside down all week. I noticed every bucket was painted inside and Mr. Livengood told me every bucket was washed out with boiling water after every run. I don't want the job washing six thousand and more buekets.

For the benefit of those who do not know, I will explain that to tap a tree a half-inch hole is bored into the tree an inch and a half, just enough to penetrate the white wood. Into this hole is placed a spout, or spile, usually made of a piece of elder from which the pith has been removed. A bucket is placed under the spout and there it is ready for the water to come. The sugar water only flows after a cold night, cold enough to slightly freeze the ground, followed by a warm morning. If the weather gets warm or rain comes the flow stops, but will start again after the next cold snap if not too late in the month of March.

Encyclopedias tell you maple sugar is made from the sap of the maple tree—but that is not correct for as soon as the sap begins to flow the season is over. The sugar water flows in the white wood close to the bark before the sap puts in an appearance. Taking it from a tree does not affect the growth or length of life of the tree. In Mr. Livengood's camp is a tree that has been tapped every year for over fifty years and it yielded this year a barrel of water every 24 hours, a yield not approached by any other of the 3600 trees in the grove.

Trees vary in the quality and quantity of water and the same tree does not yield the same every year.

After a thorough inspection of the sugar camp I want to the house, ate a splendid dinner and had a good talk. Mr. Livengood has a delightful home. The house is heated by hot air, there is running water in the basement and an air of comfort prevail everywhere.

At 3 p. m., I started for Meyersdale, six miles away, and then it rained and hailed, and the wind blew, and the lightning flashed, and the thunder was terrible, but I kept going through mud shoe-top deep. Well it was the worst six mile tramp I ever had and I was not sorry when I reached Meyersdale.

Of course, I missed the train, but Mr. Will Stiver, formerly of Bedford, who conducts a hotel at Meyersdale, gave me a splendid entertainment and I had good rest until 9:30 p. m., when I took the train for Cumberland, arriving here tired satisfied.

This is the first trip I ever made into this section, but it will not be the last.

HICKS FOR MONTH OF APRIL

Weather Will Be Much Better Than During the Past Month.

At least Weather Prophet Hicks holds out the hope of some more endurable weather than that of the past month. His predictions for April are as follows:

A marked change to warmer will pass from west to east over the country during the first two or three days of April. There will be storms, rain, wind and thunder, centering on and touching Monday and Tuesday, the 3rd and 4th. The tendency to hail storms will be greatly increased. The period will end in change to much cooler with probable snow flurries northward, and cool to frosty nights to the 6th.

The 7th and 8th changes to warmer with outbreaks of rain and storminess and makes their transit to eastern sections, being followed by change to much cooler.

A regular Vulcan storm period extends from the 11th to the 15th, and rain with thunder in numerous localities in their progress eastward over teh country.

The next storm period includes the 17th to the 20th inclusive. Very threatening electrical storms, violent and possibly tornadic in places westward and central are possible and probable. These storms will break up into snow squalls over much of the country northward, and be followed by several days of bleak to frosty weather.

The next regular storm period is central on the 24th, and April showers will thicken into wider and heavier thunder storms. At all the periods in April up to this period, many parts of the country will get more rain than for many months past.

Change to fair and cooler will follow this period up to the 29th. On the 30th reactionary storm conditions will return. April will end with much warmer weather and a series of thunder showers passing eastwardly across the country.

Will Operate Loch Lynn Hotel.

Mrs. L. B. C. List, who a few years ago operated the Loch Lynn Heights Hotel and later was hostess at Overlook Inn, will resume the management of the Loch Lynn Hotel this summer. Some repairs will be made to the property at once.

Married.

FORMER GARRETT COUNTIAN TAKES HIS LIFE.

Albert Lowdermilk, Recently of Selbysport, A Suicide at Addison, Pa.

DEED WAS COMMITTED YESTERDAY

Morning in An Outbuilding Adjoining Hotel Where He Was Employed—Leaves Wife, Mother and Two Children.

Albert Lowdermilk, son of the late Lloyd Lowdermilk, of Selbysport, committed suicide at Addison, Pa., yesterday morning about nine o'clock by cutting his throat with a small pen knife, the deed being committed in an outbuilding adjoining the hotel where Mr. Lowdermilk was employed, the discovery being made shortly afterward by his wife, who after calling for her husband several times and receiving no answer instituted a search and noticing blood trickling from beneath the door of the building gave the alarm. Neighbors came to her assistance, but the man died within a few minutes after being taken from where he was found.

Mr. Lowdermilk was about twenty-five years of age and leaves besides his wife, who was a Miss Nicklow, two children, his mother and one sister, the latter two residing at Selbysport.

The deceased up to about three years ago resided at Selbysport with his mother and then went to Addison, where he was employed, and later married. No reason has been advanced why the deceased took his life.

Farm For Sale.

As agent I offer for sale the Jennie Friend farm two miles north of Deer Park, containing 127 acres of land, sixty acres of which are cleared and in meadow. Church Notes.

Rev. E. B. Hatcher, in the Maryland Baptist of a recent issue, has this to say of the Baptist church in Garrett county: "When Rev. Faust went back to Garrett county, last week he carried a traveling companion back with him in the shape of Brother T. W. T. Noland, our State Colporter. These two brethren are expecting to start out through the county upon a tour of exploration, stopping at any place where the gospel ought to be preached. The Board has decided to station a new man in Garrett county next June, and these two brethren are seeking to pave the coming of this new missionary. Garrett county is a large mission field, with many very destitute sections. We can testify to that fact because we have been in communities in the county where the people were pleading for the Gospel."

OPPOSITION TO THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT

Many Prominent Party Men Express Their Disapproval.

GOVERNOR POSITION NOT PLAIN

A Feeling Exist That When the Proper Time Come He Will Oppose the Adoption of the Amendment Reform League Bitter Against Proposed Law

If the sentiment to be gathered today in political circles is a fair index, the proposed disfranchising Constitutional amendment will be defeated by an overwhelming vote next November.

Republicans of every shade of opinion are, of course, united in opposition to it; but independents, and many of the most regular Democrats, are fully as outspoken in their determination to only vote against what they term "the iniquitous measure," but to work and campaign against it. Interviews printed elsewhere in The News shows the views of representative men.

The most severe blow to the amendment, though, is the opposition of Governor Edwin Warfield, who is the official head of the Democratic party in this State, although not the head of the machine. Governor Warfield has as is well known, fought the measure at every point, and there is but little doubt that he will continue to do so, although he declined today to give his future plans in this regard. He usually speaks boldly, though when the proper time arrives, and it is believed that he will not now assume a position of neutrality.

The Governor arrived from New York last night after several days absence, and was at his office today endeavoring to catch up with the business which had accumulated during his absence.

"I have not yet had time to thoroughly read the opinion of the Court of Appeals," said he, "but, of course, I am aware of the general tenor of it. You may say I will cheerfully obey the mandate of the Court. The point to be decided was purely a legal one, but it was important, and I am glad it is settled."

"What will be your position in the coming campaign? Will you take the stump or make an active fight against the measure, or will you take the ground that you have discharged your duty and leave the rest to the voters."

The Governor smiled, as if he regarded this as a leading question.

"I must refer for my position to my inaugural address and my message to the Senate at the time of the passage of the amendment. The first gave my ideas of what restrictions should be placed on the voting franchise, and the second my objection to the form of amendment passed. Further than that I must decline to say for the present."

The gist of the Governor's objection to the Poe amendment, the one passed by the legislature and to be voted upon next fall, as made in his message to the Senate, was that the educational requirement was not conservative or definite, but was vague and uncertain and liable to grave abuses by the election officers. He contended that the qualification to be adopted should be in precise terms, and that the right of a citizen to vote should not depend upon the whim, opinion or partisan zeal of one set of registrars.

Republican State Chairman John B. Hanna said today that he felt confident that the objectionable amendment would be snowed under next November.

"Regalar Republicans will, of course, be against the whole amendment on the general principles," said Mr. Hanna, "because it is avowedly a scheme to eliminate a large part of the electorate which vote almost solidly with our party, and the plain effect would be to reduce us for many years to a position of hopeless minority. It will also be opposed by many who are not Republicans because they believe a strong minority party is necessary in the interest of good government, and that much has been accomplished in that direction by the Republican party in this State. They recognize that this amendment is a companion piece to the unfair election law passed by the Democratic managers, and is part of a general scheme to place those same managers in absolute control of not only the State but the Democratic party. These powerful elements being opposed to the amendment, I cannot see how it can be adopted.

"But we will leave no stone unturned until the last minute of the campaign. So far our efforts have been devoted to getting more thoroughly in touch with the workers in different parts of the State, but we will now begin a campaign of education. This will at first be done by the circulation of pamphlets and circulars and through the press, and we will work until the poeple of the whole State is made fully aware of the iniquity of this scheme. After the candidates are nominated, we shall have speakers on the stump."

As far as can ascertained, the methods outline by Mr. Hanna will be practically the same as those to be followed by the Democrats.

It is agreed by all that the campaign will be one of intense interest and probably of bitterness. Should the amendment be adoptdd the Republican party, Mr. Hanna thinks, will be hopelessly in the minority for an indefinite period of years, and should it be defeated the effect on the Democratic party in Maryland might be tremendous. Every Democratic candidate on the State and local tickets next fall must necessarily place himself squarely on record in favor of the amendment or be repudiated by the Democratic State Central Committee, which would insure his defeat. In many cases this will be embarrassing, for it may spell defeat either way. In some of the counties it will be popular to side with the amendment, but in Baltimore city and many of the counties it would seem that if the temper of the voters remains as at present no Democratic candidate could be elected.

It is believed by many that the Democratic managers are preparing to force the amendment through by wholesale frouds in the counties. It has been pointed out that there is no appeal to the courts from the returns given by the Supervisors of Elections in the vote on an amendment, and thus there can be no review. If the Supervisors, for instance, in a number of precincts where the vote was largely against the amendment should simply omit the figures in making up their returns, it is said there could be no legal remedy.

It is impossible to estimate at present how many voters would be disfranchised by the proposed amendment, because of the very fact the extent of the disfranchisement would depend entirely upon the whim of the registration officials. There are 52,167 colored voters, names on the books now, and it is safe to say that not a corporal's guard of these would be left. The last census places the number of white illiterate voters in this State at 18,307, but, of course, some of the these would be protected by the "grandfather clause."

County Democratic leaders who were seen today were not as uniformly enthusiastic as to the passage of the amendment as chairman Vandiver claims to be, and many of them spoke very gloomily of the outlook on this line.

A special dispatch to The News this afternoon from Annapolis says:

"Democratic politicians here were not surprised by the decision of the Court of Appeals on the disfranchising amendment, the result having been discounted apparently several days ago. The decision itself did not cause any excitement or much talk. Very little comment is heard upon the decision or the effect of the disfranchising act.

"Very little has been heard about the amendment here recently,' said Dr. George Wells, Clerk of the Circuit Court, 'and I doubt if much will be heard about it for some time to come. I don't think the amendment is generally popular, and I dont think the Democrats as a whole are very enthusiastic about it or the chances of carrying it. There has been good deal of opposition to it in the county, and while some of this has died out, a considerable amount still remains. The fact that it is a party measure, however, will have much weight with the regular Democrats."

Mr. Charles Morris Howard, secretary of the Reform League, enters a pronounced objection to the first clause, although he finds the others are also pernicious. The idea that ward executives shall interpret the Constitution when eminent jurists dissent, he regards as opening a way for gross frauds to be perpetrated.

"The decision of the Court of Appeals," he said, "that the franchise amendment to the Constitution shall be voted on by the people simply determines a legal question of a preliminary character. The merits of the amendment remain to be discussed, and doubtless there will be a vigorous campaign waged for and against it.

"I am decidedly of the opinion that the amendment is pernicious, and I think it would be extremely unfortunate if our people should adopt it. The ostensible purpose of the amendment is to disfranchise the negroes but is is so couched that many white persons could, under its provisions be prevented from voting. The requirement that a person shall be able to give a reasonable explanation of our State Constitution as a condition to exercising the voting privilege is a severe one. Able lawyers have difficulty in explaining the instruction. The Attorney General Mr. Gans have recently taken one view, and Messrs. Carter, Poe and Miles precisely the opposite view in construing our Constitution. Our Court of Appeals has just rendered an opinion, but three of its judges dissent as to a portion of such an opinion. If distinguished judges and jurists cannot reach an agreement after careful preparation and study, how utterly ridiculous to expect a layman to construe this instrument in the registration room at a moment's notice.

"Still more ridiculous is such an examination when conducted by the judges of election, who are laymen, and in many cases ignorant, vicious and unscrupulous. If this section of the proposed amendment was not intended to facilitate fraud and favoritism, its authors must have been more simple-minded persons than they probably were. Such a provision reeks with ugly possibilities, and, if it is adopted, it will be impossible to safeguard our election law in a satisfactory way, because the wrong done will be imbedded in the Constitution itself.

"I will not speak of the injustice of attempting to disfranchise one class of citizens by reason of color, for this is what the sections of the amendment are intended in effect to do, but in my judgment the race question is not acute in Maryland, and does not justify a radical departure. But in comparably worse than the second and third sections is the first section, because it applies no test of any sort or description, but furnishes a purely arbitrary rule, with abundant opportunity for dishonesty and favoritism.

"I am sure that the Reform League will do it part in helping to defeat the proposed amendment, and I assume that it will go actively to work as soon as the municipal election is out of the way."—Friday's Baltimore News.

Poultry and Garden Fence.

From all parts of the country there has come a demand for a special poultry fence,—one that could also be used for putting around gardens and yards, and strong enough if necessary to keep out horses, hog and cattle. After careful consideration, the manufacturers of the Electric Welded Fence have designed a "Perfect" fence of this kind at a very moderate price. It is not a netting, understand, but a good substantial fence, and is close enough at the bottom to keep out the smallest chickens, and you need no top or bottom boards. For further information regarding this fence write us for catalogue.

NOT SANCTIONED BY THE COURT

Judge Keedy Speaks Plainly and to the Point

CONCERNING DIVORCE MATTER

In An Opinion Filed on Monday the Court Speaks In No Uncertain Term In Regard to An Answer Remarkable In More Ways Than One.

In the suit of Lula Mecella Dunn vs. John T. Dunn, for divorce, Judge Keedy on Monday afternoon filed an opinion in which he says that upon consideration of the testimony submitted, "I have concluded to grant the divorce as prayed, but in so doing I do not wish to be understood as giving sanction to proceedings as they appear in this cause." Continuing the Court says:

"It is evident from the testimony taken upon the petition, that as soon as the complainant saw the solicitor who filed the bill for her in this cause, that said solicitor sought the defendent and endeavored to induce him to sign an answer and to use said solicitor's own language—'I gave him the bill and answer and suggested that it was the proper thing to do' The thing suggested as the proper thing to do was to sign the answer prepared by the solicitor for the complaint. An examination of this answer shows that it is a remarkable answer in more ways than one. In it the defendant waives any and all process for his appearance; he waives all notice of the time of taking testimony upon the part of the complainant in support of the allegations of her bill; he waives the taking of testimony upon his part, although at that time he did not know and could not know what charge might be made against him by witness. He was willing to let anything that might be said against him pass and become a record in this court unchallenged by him. He, in said answer, waives the right to file exceptions to the testimony taken upon the part of the complainant. No matter how incompetent the witness, how irrelevant the testimony, whether the witness might charge him with rape, arson, murder, or any other crime known to the law, he consents it shall pass and remain unchallenged by him. And he further waives, in said answer, the right to appeal from any order or decree passed by Court. He consents to the taking of testimony on the part of the complainant immediately; the filing of said testimony in Court, immediately upon the same being taken; and the immediate submission thereof to the Court for final decree 'waiving all law and rules of Court to the contrary.'

"A defendant who has been charged with being unfaithful to marital vows and who is willing to sign such an answer to such charges upon the part of his wife, either is far down in the moral declivity, or else badly wants to be relieved from the conjugal bond. It does not seem to me that such an answer is the proper kind to file in such a case, or that it is the proper thing for the solicitor for the complainant to prepare such an answer for the defendant to sign and suggest to him that it is the proper thing for him to do to sign such an answer. But the testimony shows shat the defendant knew of the pendency of the suit against him, upon the part of his wife, and he has not asked to be heard in opposition thereto. The testimony upon the merits of the bill seems to sustain the allegations as therein charged and to entitle the complainant to the relief as prayed.

"The testimony upon the petition is to the effect that there was no collusion between the complainant and defendant, although an answer, such as filed in this cause, standing alone and unexplained, must lead irresistably to such a conclusion. As the complainant seems to have a meritorious case, I will grant the divorce as prayed."

A. S. Garis was solicitor for Mrs. Dunn. The first bill of complaint was dismissed by the Court, but later leave was granted complainant to take testimony before an examiner in supportof the allegations.

The Raising Of Lazarus.

The white walls of a villa peer through the thick foliage of the olives on the eastern slope of Olivet. It is the home of comfort and love, but deeply shadowed now. Out of that courtyard lately came a funeral train. The body, carried on a bier, was swathed in linen bands. There were the discordant notes of flutes and hired wailers. The director had thrice halted the procession to comfort the mourners. An egg had been broken—sign of mortality, and Moses' psalm chanted, and the body laid on the rocky shelf in the grotto. The stone had been rolled across the mouth of the sepulcher, and all whitened to remind the inadvertent not to approach within four cubits on penalty of ceremonial defilement.

The saddest part of it, the return, had been accomplished. During the absence of the mourners assiduous hands had overturned the couches and strewn broken pottery about to symbolize destruction. The sisters sit now with veiled faces and dust upon their heads and unsandled feet, break their fast with only egg and lentils, while throngs pay their stiff visits of condolence. Every casual word the bereaved sisters speak makes a mournful refrain. Every time they steal away to the tomb to weep they are persistently followed by those who make merchandise of their condolence. In this instance, as in most, there is that ever-recurring "if." If so and so, our brother would not have died. That "if" is a very inquisitor's instrument.

The fourth day had come—that fatal fourth day after death—when, according to Jewish notion, the spirit which until then hovers about the corpse, sees the signs of decay in the face, and takes its final departure. Only then did Jesus come. This delay was not, however, at the expense of Lazarus and his sisters. The spiritual gains to them were incalculable. At the same time it gave Jesus opportunity to work His transcendent miracle.

Martha goes impetuously to meet the Master, and utters her plaintive "if." Her faith sweeps out to embrace the hope of her brother's immediate restoration. But when Jesus seems to confirm the hope it as quickly recedes. We can forgive Martha that, since it drew from the Savior's lips that majestic affirmation which has heartened the dying and bereaved in every generation since. Now Mary, summoned, comes with stronger, though unexpressed, faith. She is followed by her guests of condolence. Thus the miracle is furnished with witnesses certainly not prejudiced in favor of the Worker.

A great surge of sorrows breaks upon Jesus' heart in the effort to control, which He shakes and groans. It gives place to tenderest sympathy for the bereaved and that great company of mourners they represent in each succeeding age. His tears cause favorable remark. But a discordant note is also struck by those who wish to discount the recent miracle in Jerusalem by Jesus' failure to avert this event Martha's faith also shrinks back as she protests against uncovering the putrescence of the tomb; but Jesus encourages her to believe and see the Glory of God.

When the stone is rolled away, Jesus, with uplifted eyes, joyously acknowledges the assurance He has received that what He is about to do meets with the Father's approval. Both prayer and miracle are designed to quicken the faith of those who hear and see.

Then He, who is both Life and Resurrection, in a voice of indisputable authority, bids the sleeper awake. He speaks and it is done. Lazarus "stands forth fresh and free without a taint upon him of the chill and horrors of the tomb."

The Teacher's Lantern.

The eleventh chapter of John is not surpassed in pictorialness. Sixty years after the evangelists had no difficulty in reproducing the scene from the negative plat of memory.

* * * * *

Love caused delay. "Jesus loved. Therefore when He heard He abode two days still." Rushing to the rescue is not always the kindest act, though it may be harder to stand off and see suffering. Great were the gains to Lazarus and his sisters of this apparent loss.

* * * * *

The inefficiency of human sources of comfort is well shown by the mourners "for revenue" and the condolence visitors in the homa at Bethany.

* * * * *

The resurrection and immortal life are not far off abstractions. They are concerated in an imminent Christ. Those who are joined to Him, whether dead or living (as we use the words), live (in the higher meaning which Jesus has put into the Word). The dead in Christ have not lost the living can not lose this immortal life. He that hath the Son hath life.

* * * * *

Jesus here, as His custom was, associated others with Him in the working of the miracle. Human hands did all they could. They rolled away the stone and unwound the cerements. Men can be coworkers with God in spiritual resurrections to-day.

* * * * *

In this transcendent scene Jesus is the commanding figure. Calm, deliberate, majestic, he stands the conscious victor over death, hades and the grave. Jesus' self was greater than His deed.

* * * * *

This was Jesus' climactical miracle. It inspired the ovation of the "triumphal entrance," and prompted Mary to anoint Jesus. It also set hell on fire to compass His death.

Mosaic from Commentaries.

As the man who had been blind promised Jesus beforehand that he would believe on the Son of God, because he more than suspected Jesus to be He, so do such souls as Peter's and Martha's believe (in their several ways) beforehand in that eternal life of which the words of Jesus speaks without comprehending all at once the when, the where, the how, or the secrets of God's power in the resurrection.—Stier. The people which stand by: There stood collective humanity waiting in spirit at the grave of Lazarus; and the grave question whether God would or would not hear His only begotten, whether He would authenticate or desert the word of Christ; whether He would confirm or bring naught his once-uttered words, must here be decided.—Haustein.

CONSTIPATION

A Visit to Central West Virginia.

To the Editor of The Republican.

A few rambling thoughts from my inexperienced pen may not be uninteresting to some of the many readers of your valuable journal, so I venture to send you a brief sketch of my recent visit to the mountain State of West Virginia. Being a native of that State you will pardon me for taking a kindly interest in its development.

Leaving Oakland on train 55 the 13th inst., my first stop was at Grafton which is a thriving city of eight or ten thousand inhabitants and is the capital of Taylor county and is a very good location for business though not so desirable for residence as some other places. Real estate here has advanced about 100 per cent in the last few years. Near this city is where the writer was born. His father, Jacob Moon and his son-in-law, A. W. Shaw, lately deceased, were the first settlers of Grafton.

The following day I left here over the G. & B. railroad, passing through Philippi, a very pretty town and the county seat of Barbour county, thence on to Tygarts Junction there I changed cars. This is a new road just open for transportation. It was noon when I arrived at Buckhannon. Here I found a very beautiful and growing town destined to become a city of considerable prominence. This is the capital of Upshur county. It contains a large tannery, several glass factories and other enterprises, but alas! for the thirsty ones there are no saloon. The Wesleyan University of West Virginia is located here. A number of Garrett countians have been educated here. I had the pleasure of meeting the following persons from our beloved county and state of Maryland, viz.: Messrs. Geo. N. Steyer, Luke and Timothy Moon, of District No. 8; Wallace and Lee Mason, of Oakland; and J. H. Cuppett and Gilbert B. Moon of District No. 6. These young gentlemen are pursuing their studies enthusiastically and are making a splendid record. The destruction by fire of the main building recently was a serious loss, but it has not materially interfered with the progress of the school. The authorities are preparing to erect a new building immediately which will be much larger and more convenient than the old one. There are about 500 students attending the university.

After a pleasant stay here of two days I departed for Weston which is only 16 miles distant. We are now near the geographical center of the state. To many this is an ideal city for both residential and business purposes. It is situated in the Monongahela Valley right in the heart of great and seemingly unlimited fields of natural gas, oil, and coal which are exceedingly cheap to the consumers. Weston is the county seat of Lewis county and has many business enterprises and we judge others will soon follow because of the liberal inducements. Note this: Free sites are offered to manufactoring plants, and natural gas can be secured for factoring purpose at 3 cents per thousand cubic feet. Among the prominent buildings is the West Virginia Hospital for the Insane which is said to be the largest stone building of its kind in the United States. After a limited time here we took the train for Clarksburg on our circuitous route home, we spent only a few hours in this flourishing little city which is the capital of Harrison county.

Mr. F. D. Brooke, formerly of Garrett county, resides here. He is an up-to-date business man and is prospering in his artistic profession. The court house and jail are fine, substantial buildings, and here they seen to have need of them, for on a recent Sabbath day four murders were committed. Electric street cars are found here, the first we had seen in the State; however franchises are being granted for a regular net work of electric car lines connecting Grafton, Morgantown, Fairmont, Clarksburg, Weston, Buckhannon and other places. West Virginia is a great state, and increasingly so, but Marylanders excel by far.

Notice to Contractors!

Notice of Letting the Contract for a Jail and Sheriff's Residence, for Garrett County, at It's County Seat, Oakland, Md.

Sealed proposals will be received by the Clerk of the County Commissioners of Garrett County, at Oakland, Md., for the furnishing of all materials and labor required for the erection and completion of a Jail and Sheriff's Residence according to the plans and specifications prepared by Holmboe & Lafferty, Architects, Clarksburg, W. Va., copies of which are now on file at the Commissioners' Office and at the office of the above named Architects.

Said proposals will be received until 2 o'clock P. M. on the 12th Day of April, 1905,

and will be opened the same day by the County Commissioners and as soon as the said proposals have been examined the said County Commissioners will take action towards the letting of the contract.

Each proposal must be accompanied by a certified check of twenty-five per cent. of its amount, or a surety bond for a like amount made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett county as a guarantee that the successful bidder will enter into a contract and furnish a bond double the amount of his bid.

This bond must be issued by a regular Surety Guarantee Co., and furnished within a reasonable time after the contract has been signed.

The said check or bond shall become forfeited to the County Commissioners if for any reason the successful bidder shall fail to enter into a contract and furnish the bond as aforesaid after its acceptance by the said County Commissioners.

This bond must be made payable to the County Commissioners of Garrett County and the conditions of the said bond shall guarantee the faithful performance and execution of the work according to the plans and specifications on file as aforesaid.

After the contract has been signed and the bond approved the certified checks will be returned to their respective makers and if the contract is not awarded within two weeks from the opening of the bids the obligation of the bidders will cease and their checks returned.

Each bidder shall accompany his bid with samples of the material he intends to use for cell construction, with a full size sample of the grating 2 inches square, and samples of plates 4 inches square, also a model or full size drawing of the locking device with detail specifications covering its construction; also each bidder must accompany his bid with samples of the cut stone.

The County Commissioners will award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder and they reserve the right to reject one or all bids.

By order of the Board,

1-5t. A. G. ROSS, Clerk.

is an indispensible household remedy because it is a preventive as well as a cure, and because it arrests development of all contageous germs and bacterial diseases. It cures croup, colds, tonsilitis with its associated ills and all inflamed and catarrhal conditions of the mucous surface. It is a harmless vegetable preparation that may safely be administered to the tenderest babe. If not for sale in your neighborhood, write to

CALIFORNIA

Do you want to live where the climate is mild the year round—where labor is never oppressed by stress of weather, and where animal vitality is never lost by mere conflict with cold?

Do you want to live in a region where the resources are more varied than in any other equal area in the world, where the division of great ranches affords a fine opportunity to get a small farm that will assure you a competence?

Do you want to live where, with a minimum of labor, you can grow profitable crops of grapes and small fruit, oranges, lemons, olives, prunes and almonds, alfalfa and grain, where crops are sure, business is good and capital easily finds profitable investment?

Then go to California, where both health and opportunity await your coming.

The Chicago, Union Pacific and North-Western Line

is the most direct route to the Pacific Coast, and there are two fast through trains daily via this line, over the famous double-track railway between Chicago and the Missouri River. One-way Colonist tickets are on sale daily, March 1 to May 15, at the rate of $33.00 from Chicago, with correspondingly low rates from all points, give you an unusual chance to make the trip.

$33

These tickets are good on daily and personally conducted excursions, on which a double berth in a Pullman tourist sleeping car from Chicago costs only $7.00. Round-trip tickets are always on sale from all points at reduced rates via the Friendsville, April 4, 1905.

For County Treasurer.

I announce myself a candidate for County Treasurer and respectfully solicit the support and influence of my friends.

J. W. WHITE.

Oakland, March 7th, 1905.

MR. JOHN H. CUPPET, of Friendsville, announces himself in this issue of THE REPUBLICAN as a candidate for the nomination of State Senator from this county, subject to the decision of the Republican Nominating Convention, the date for holding which has not yet been fixed. Mr. Cuppet has for many years been one of the leading and progressive citizens of Friendsville, where he is engaged in the mercantile business and is also identified with the First National Bank of that town as one of its directors. He has other interests also and is a thorough going, industrious and successful business man. Should Mr. Cuppet be nominated the interests of Garrett county's citizens may be safely entrusted in his hands.

THE Mountain Lake Park News, issued for the first time on last Friday, has been received at this office. The paper is purely a local one "devoted to the interests of Garrett county in general and Mountain Lake Park and Loch Lynn Heights in particular." The editor is Mr. John D. Hayden, who in his salutatory "eschews politics from a partisan standpoint and will not be the organ or mouthpiece of any political party, clique, corporation or association of individuals." The paper contains much local matter pertaining to the Park and Loch Lynn.

THE SUFFRAGE IN MARYLAND.

The Maryland Court of Appeals has decided that the franchise amendment to the State constitution, which was passed a year ago by both houses of the legislature, must be submitted to the people, despite the fact that it was never presented to the Governor for his approval. Governor Warfield made it known last March, after the legislature had adjourned, that he would not promulgate the amendment or consent to its appearance next November on the official ballot. Legal proceedings were brought to compel him to submit the question to the voters, and the Court of Appeals has now squarely overruled the State administration. The court by a vote of five to three holds that the legislature was within its powers in declining to submit the proposed amendment to the Govrnor for approval or disapproval, and it commands him to take the steps necessary to carry out the legislature's intentions. The amendment must go on the official ballot and the voters must decide whether or not the suffrage of Maryland shall be "purged" after the Mississippi and North Carolina methods.

Governor Warfield's position in the controversy thus ended has brought him into violent antagonism with the managers of the Democratic State machine. He was elected in 1903 on a platform which urged the disfranchisement of the negro voter. But though he favored the elimination of the negro as a factor in politics, he proposed to accomplish that object, if possible, in a fairminded and constitutional way. He was willing to approve an amendment imposing an illiteracy test, but he wanted that test to apply impartially to both white and black illiterates. He did not advise the use in Maryland of the "grandfather clause" exemption, under which white illiterates can vote without question if they were qualified voters before January 1, 1869—that is, before the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution—or are lineal descendants of such voters. Moreover, the Governor objected to the loosely defined and practically arbitrary powers granted to the boards of registration authorized to apply the illiteracy test. He foresaw the flagrant abuses which these partisan bodies would inevitably commit if they were allowed to judge without restraint or appeal the capacity of an applicant for registration to "understand and explain" some technical or mystifying except from the State constitution.

The leaders in the legislature persisted in passing the so-called Poe amendment, embodying all the features to which the Governor objected. Nor would they give him a chance to brand the measure with his public disapproval. The amendment was never presented to him. It was filed with the clerk of the Court of Appeals, and a message from the Governor advising the legislature that he expected it to observe the ordinary legislative forms in dealing with the suffrage restriction question was spread on the records of the two houses without comment or acknowledgment.

What effect the Governor's opposition will have on the fate of the amendment is difficult to guess. If he takes the stump against the unconstitutional and extravagantly partisan scheme of disfranchisement proposed by the machine leaders, its defeat would seem to be assured. Maryland has little or nothing to gain from a restriction of the suffrage. It has a population over 80 per cent white, and the "negro domination" is now, as it has always been, a mere campaign bogie. Possibly some honest and nonpartisan illiteracy act would be approved by a majority of the present electorate. But the introduction of Mississippi and North Carolina methods would be a grave political blunder. The Poe amendment aims to throw the control of state elections into the hands of irresponsible partisan election boards, whose voice is to be final in determining the rights and qualifications of voters. This would be a lamentable step backward. The public welfare is not menanced by the present system of unrestricted manhood suffrage Whatever the faults of that system may be, they are far more tolerable than the denial of equal rights and the subversion of popular sovereignty which are sure to follow the adoption of the Poe Gorman model of irresponsible star chamber government. The Maryland campaign this year will be one of vital and far reaching interest.—New Yerk Tribune.

James W. Abernathy.

After an illness of only a few days the Omnipotent God sent his angel to bear to eternity the soul of the venerable James W. Abernathy, of near Wilson, W. Va., who died March 19th at six o'clock a. m.

The deceased was confined to his bed but a few days, his death being due to the infirmities of old age. He was born in Mineral county, W. Va., May 16, 1823, and was married to Mrs. Anderson, a widow, formerly Miss Sharpless, in June, 1851. They moved to Alleganv (now Garrett) county where they have since resided.

Mr. Abernathy was a faithful and consistent member of the German Baptist Brethren church for over 48 years. He leaves an aged widow and son, Rev Isaac W. Abernathy, minister and elder of the same church, and a former county commissioner of this county; and one daughter, Mrs. Jeremiah Harvy, three grandchildren and one great-grandchild, together with many friends and neighbors who mourn his sad demise.

The funeral took place Monday, March 20, from the Fairview church near his home, the service being conducted by Rev. Emra T. Fike, after which interment was made in the home cemetery. Deceased was a devoted husband and father, a good and peaceable neighbor, charitable in all things and loved by all who knew him.

The sympathies of all the friends and neighbors are with the afflicted family in this their sad bereavement.

Streets and Pavements Viewed By Mayor and Councilmen Yesterday.

Yesterday Mayor McComas and Councilmen Lawton, Harned, Lauer, Legge and Helbig made the annual inspection of streets, alleys and sidewalks in Oakland, noting where repairs were necessary and what should be done looking to the welfare and health of the community.

At several places needed repairs to platforms were found and in the course of a few days the necessary notices to the property holders will be served upon them to repair or rebuild their walks.

Needed repairs to the streets will also be made.

OPERA HOUSE CHANGES HANDS.

Property Has Been Purchased by Alex. Hesen and Others.

Tuesday afternoon Alex. Hessen, for himself and as a representative of others interested, purchased from Messrs. D. E. Bolden & Co. the opera house in Oakland, the deed for the property to be delivered within sixty days from date, or upon the pavment of the balance of the purchase money.

BLOOMINGTON.

Buxton has at last had its broken machinery repaired and started work with a full complement of men on last Tuesday morning. The resumption of work at this place is a great relief to quite a number of our people who depend upon the plant for a livelihood and whose enforced idleness for the past thirty days has made things awfully blue.

Mr. Harry Kidd, of Fairmont, left for his home on Tuesday morning after a week's visit to relatives in town.

Mr. and Mrs. Michael Flynn have purchased the surface right of the Henry Warnick farm, comprising a little over 100 acres, about 3 miles from town. We understand the price paid was $700.

Mrs. John Brady, of Cedar Cliff, was a guest of relatives on Saturday and Sunday.

Rev. A. R. Snedegar, of the M. E. church, has been reappointed minister for the Bloomington Circuit.

Contractor Sigler delivered the keys of the new Junior hall to the members of the building committee on last Monday evening. The first regular meeting of the membership in their new quarters occurred on last Tuesday night and was largely attended.

Mr. E. R. Brydon, of Baltimore, is in town, being called to the bedside of his sick brother, Mr. W. A. Brydon whose condition is reported decidedly critical by his physicians.

Messrs. Russell Pattison and John Raley, two of our well known and popular base ball players, who have signed contracts with the Cardinals, of Cumberland, left for that city on Monday to report for practice.

Commissioner Stump put the finishing touches on the new bridge on last Saturday morning, and in less than an hour thirteen teams had made use of the new convenience.

The grand summer opening and open-air carousal of the "booze hisers" under the "bamboo" tree took place on last Monday night. Bock beer, ham sandwiches, onions, limburger cheese and pickles comprised the drinkables and eatables and soon had the "histers" in the gayest kind of humor. The consumption of beer was enormous and the membership sustained their well-earned reputation of disposing of the same with very little effort. Grand Chief Swiller presided at the meeting and gave the first order to remove corks about 8 o'clock. Several new members were initiated and took the skull varnish degree, while a few of the older members were advanced one or two points and decorated with the order of the "bloats." The bung holes were closed and the lid dropped at 11.

Rev. Price of the M. E. church, Swanton, on his way home from the late session of the Baltimore Conference, was in town Wednesday visiting his son, Mr. Herbert Price.

Mr. Warren Martin and little daughter Helen, of Pennsboro, W. Va., en route home from Baltimore, stopped off for a few days to visit Dr. and Mrs. Kemp.

Mr. L. B. Brydon, of Grafton, W. Va., has purchased all the coal interests of Mr. Truman Warnick, one of the heirs of the estate of the late Henry Warnick.

Mr. and Mrs. F. S. McRobie, of Swanton, have been the guests for the past few days of their friend Mrs. Mary Miller.

Rev. H. H. Kight, of Piedmont, W. Va., was in town on Wednesday.

The Hampshire four-foot, operated under a lease and royalty by the Marstellar Coal Co., has closed down for an indefinite period, pending the settlement of the price demanded by the company and the prize offered by one of their largest customers. The miners expect the difficulty to be adjusted within the next two weeks, if not sooner, and work resumed.

Mr. James Rowe has secured work at Blaine and will move his family that place as soon as a house can be rented.

BITTINGER.

The notable event of the week was the gathering of the good people of this community at the Lutheran parsonage on Friday evening, March 31st, and treating Rev. Shoup to a most generous donation. The people were cordially received by their pastor and his charming daughter Miss Ruth, who entertained the young people very agreeably, whilst her father mingled sociably with his older guests. After the party had dispersed the parsonage larder was found to be well filled with good things. We are told that upwards of $50 in goods, provisions and cash were donated.

Mrs. Hattie D. Engle and little daughters are at home again on "Breeze Hill" after a stay of three months in the Monumental City.

Rev. Shoup and daughter are occupying the parsonage since Mrs. Engle's return from Baltimore.

Neighbor C. E. Ellithorpe is a few strides in advance of his agricultural brethren, as he has already planted his early potatoes.

Prof. Edward Brenneman informs us that it is a puzzling proposition when a sweet faced young lady asks a fellow whether he is in love.

A company of attorneys from Oakland were here last Monday afternoon.

Prof. W. A. Althers is again among his mountain friends, after wintering at his home in Virginia.

Peter Bigford and E. Winters, of near Beckman, have rented the Cunningham homestead for the summer, and will occupy same with their families.

Miss Nettie Brenninger, of Sunnyside was the guest of her sister, Mrs. T. B. Wiley last Sunday, and was accompanied on her return by Miss Myrtle Wiley, who will be her guest for a few week.

Mr. Fred Snyder was calling on the merchants of this place last Monday in the interest of a tobacco firm.

Miss Mollie Selders is the guest of Mrs. G. W. Engle this week.

Alarm of Fire Last Night.

A house located on Oak street, owned by Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill and occupied by Hannah Red and her family, caught fire from sparks falling upon the roof from the chimney. The blaze was discovered by some of the people residing in the neighborhood and extinguished before the chemical engine arrived. The alarm was sounded by the electric light whistle and created quite an excitement among the people, many of whom had retired for the night.

For Sale—Tread Power.

Can use one, two or three horses, suitable for grinding corn on cob, sawing wood, shredding fodder, chopping hay or straw—in fact anything power may be attached to. The machine is almost new, in thorough repair and will be sold at a bargain. Farm work requiring use of horses operating it and the installation of a gas engine to take its place is our reason for offering it for sale.

For Thin Babies

Fat is of great account to a baby; that is why babies are fat. If your baby is scrawny, Scott's Emulsion is what he wants. The healthy baby stores as fat what it does not need immediately for bone and muscle. Fat babies are happy; they do not cry; they are rich; their fat is laid up for time of need. They are happy because they are comfortable. The fat surrounds their little nerves and cushions them. When they are scrawny those nerves are hurt at every ungentle touch. They delight in Scott's Emulsion. It is as sweet as wholesome to them.

JONATHAN CODDINGTON.

Being the pastor of Jonathan Coddington, who died at his late home near Elder Hill at the advanced age of 79 years and who was buried at Addison, Pa., we have been asked to add a few words to the account of his death noted in your columns by the Rev. A. L. Donachy, who is not only a kind hearted Baptist minister, but is also an honored citizen of our town. After first indorsing all that our brother said about the deceased, we wish to add that our church records show that Brother Coddington was an honored member of the Friendsville Methodist Episcopal church, a regular contributor to her support and an attendant of our church services when his health permitted, having joined our church over twenty years ago. It was our privilege to visit him a short time before he died and to find him still exercising saving faith in the Son of God; therefore, we are satisfied that while he has ceased to be a member of the church militant he has become a member of the church triumphant beyond our mortal vision. His widow, Mrs. Mary Coddington, is the only member of the Coddington family whose name still remain in our church records. She and her children have the united prayers of our church and their many other friends.

In connection with these added words we wish to publicly answer the question, "why we do not make our visits more general among the sick" by saying that we, like all other ministers who observe the rules of ministerial etiquet, feel it our duty as well as a privilege to visit all our members and others who contribute to the suport of our congregations at all times without being invited; but to visit those who are members of other churches under any circumstances without being specially invited to do so would be contrary to ministerial etiquet and give room for others to call us a proselyte, especially when they have their own pastors and friends to visit them. These are the reasons that we do not make "our visitations more general among the sick" and others who are not our members.

W. M. LISTER.

MRS. BELLE FRAZEE.

At her late home in Selbysport Mrs. Belle Frazee departed this life on Saturday morning, April 1st, and was buried on Sunday afternoon in the burying ground near Selbysport. The funeral services were in charge of her pastor Rev. W. M. Lister, assisted by the Rev. A. L. Donachy and members of the order of the K. of P. of which her husband is a member, the singing being in charge of F. G. Fox assisted by the order. Mrs. Frazee was converted and joined the Methodist church at Selbysport in Feb., 1894, under the pastorate of Rev. C. W. Cox. She was about twenty-seven years old, a kind neighbor, a faithful companion, a consistent christian and a patient sufferer, and leaves a husband and five children to mourn their loss which is her gain. The father and children have the united prayers of their many friends.

MEYERS—Davis Meyers, the eighteen months' old son of Walter Meyers of near Blooming Rose, was buried in the cemetery at the church at Blooming Rose on Sunday, March 26th, the funeral sermon being preached by Pastor W. M. Lister to a full house who came to mourn with the greatly bereaved father and mother, who have the sympathy of the entire community in these their sad hours of trouble.

CASTEEL—Jeremiah Casteel, who died April 1st, was buried from his late home near Kendall on Monday, the 3rd, in the cemetary at Blooming Rose, when the church was filled with his many friends who came to pay their last tribute of respect and to sympathize with his widow and five children who are left to mourn the loss of a husband and father taken from them by the doings of a wise Providence. The funeral was preached by W. M. Lister, the pastor of the church. The deceased was forty-o years old and had been married for seventeen years. He was a good father and kind husband and leaves a host of friends.

W. M. LISTER

STEPHENS—Mrs. James Stephens, youngest daughter of ex-Judge Elias Merrill, of Garrett county, died at her home at Merrill, Md., Monday afternoon, aged 20 years. She was the wife of James Stephens, a well known farmer of Merrill, and leaves a husband and two-year old son. The remains were buried at Merill yesterday morning at 10 o'clock.

BARNARD.—Mr. S. Fuller Barnard died very suddenly at his home, North Mechanic street Friday night at 11 o'clock. Mr. Barnard had left his cigar store early in the evening and gone to his home. He seemed in excellent spirits and was chatting with his wife when he suddenly sank back in his chair unconscious and when Dr. W. W. Wiley, who was quickly summoned, reached the house, Mr. Barnard's spirit had fled.

The deceased was a member of one of the oldest and most prominent families in Western Maryland. His father, Mr. Wm. R. Barnard, represented Garrett county in the General Assembly for several sessions and was a speaker of considerable ability and very popular in this section of Maryland.

The deceased was 51 years of age and is survived by his widow, who was Miss Bridget Barrett, Mt. Savage, four daughters, his mother, two brothers, William and Ward, of this city, and two sisters, Mrs. Philip Kahl and Miss Barnard, of Cumberland. He was a cousin of Mr. Fuller Barnard, former sheriff of Allegany county.

Mr. Barnard was a locomotive engineer on the C. & P. until the G. C. & C. road was built, when he was made master of engines for that road, which position he held until January 1, 1904. A few months ago he started a cigar and tobacco store on Baltimore street.—Cumberland News.

Deed Has Been Received.

The deed for the Corrigan property which was purchased some weeks ago by the congregation of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, has been received by the official board of the church and is now a matter of record in the office of Clerk Tower. The purchase money, $3,400, was paid upon delivery of the deed.

Plans for the proposed new building will be adopted shortly when work on the erection of the building will be commenced.

Mr. H. S. Yoder, one of the progressive farmers and stock breeders of the Grantsville section of Garrett county, offers for sale by advertisement published in this paper today thoroughbred Shorthorn cattle eligible to registry and solicits correspondence from those contemplating making purchases of cattle. Mr. Yoder also breeds Plymouth Rock fowls and has for sale some of the finest birds of that breed. His farm is located near Grantsville and is one of the best equipped in the country.

A party of four physicians of Columbus, Ohio, arrived here on Sunday and spent the day looking over the Oakland Hotel property with a view to either renting or purchasing it for the purpose of establishing a sanitarium. The gentlemen were very much impressed with the location of the property and made many favorable comments upon the appearance of the town. Whether or not negotiations for the property have been carried through we are unable to state.

Dr. Webster Ravenscroft, of Accident, sold at public auction at his home in that village a few days ago his real estate to Speicher Bros. and also disposed of much of his personal property. He has to removed with his family to Oakland and is occupying the farm adjoining the Weber place, whichhe has purchased from his brother, Senator R. A. Ravenscroft.

DR. RAVENSCRAFT PRACTICALLY WELL.

Has Almost Entirely Recovered His Usual Good Health.

This paper is extremely pleased to be able to state that Dr. W. H. Ravenscraft of Oakland, whose serious illness was noted in these columns last week and for a few days, his life despaired of by his relatives and many friends here, owing to the formation of a clot on his brain, is in such an improved state that his entire and ultimate recovery is only the matter of a few days or weeks at the utmost.

The report published in one of our local contemporaries that the Doctor was violently insane was the imagination of the writer of that article and had no foundation whatever.

A police justice in New Jersey fined two women $10 each for carrying concealed weapons, the "concealed weapons" being their abusive tongues, which the women let fly at each other in the justice's august court. This promised to open up new and startling possibilities in the criminal courts, but on an appeal to the courts the ruling of the police magistrate was set aside—probably on the ground that it would establish a dangerous precedent.

Dr. B. F. Laughlin, of Mountain Lake Park, has located at Blaine, West Va., for the practice of his profession. Dr. Frank is the son of Dr. and Mrs. J. W. Laughlin, of the Park, and is a recent graduate of the leading medical college of Maryland where he carried off high honors upon his graduation. He is peculiarly equipped for the successful pursuit of his profession, being a gentleman of more than ordinary ability, sober, industrious and progressive. May he prosper, is the wish of THE REPUBLICAN and his host of friends in Oakland and the Park

Obituary.

Earnest Stilley was born in Germany Jan. 7th, 1821. He came to America in 1847 and settled on the Allegany mountains in Allegany (now Garrett) county, Md.

He was among the first settlers of this part of the country. Father Stilley on coming to this country was a member of the Lutheran church at Red House, and remained a member there until a few years ago, when he moved his membership and placed it in the M. E. church at Oak Grove, near his home.

Bro. Stilley lived a very humble, devoted, christian life, always proving to the world his faith by his works. As he was nearing the end of his earthly pilgrimage he manifested the same spirit and trust in Christ Jesus by his patience and calmness.

On the first day of March, 1905, after only a few days of illness with pneumonia, at the age 84 years, 1 month and 24 days, he quit the shores of time and with Paul he could say, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

His funeral was preached by his pastor, E. J. Westfall, at Oak Grove church, after which his body was laid to rest in the cemetery near the church to wait the resurrection.
